Mr. COPELAND. I simply asked the question—and I think the Senator has answered it—whether there would not be the same benefit to the Northwest if the canal went through New York State. It would cost more money, I must admit, but it would be entirely within American territory, and I assume would accomplish the same purpose for the Northwest as would the St. Lawrence waterway.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I assume that ocean ships could go up that canal the same as they could the projected one. I am sure the Senate would be glad to have the Senator expound that route, because I know he has studied it.

As to the objection which has been raised about foreign ships coming here carrying foreign goods, it is true that they do that, and they come here carrying goods made in foreign countries; they come into every harbor. But they also carry American goods going out, and our trade balances show that they take more goods out of the country than they bring in. There is why the trade balance is usually in our favor. The goods they take out, which are in far greater quantity than the goods they bring in, are made by American labor. There is nothing but commerce to that. If we are going to object on that score, then it would be logical for the State of New York to prohibit any other State from shipping goods into New York, and for Minnesota to prohibit any State from shipping goods into Minnesota. It would finally dwindle down to a county, and then to each township. So I cannot see that there is anything to that argument.

The Senator from Missouri raised what I consider a legitimate question here, and I am as much concerned about that as is the Senator from Missouri, although I am not so much worried about it. The Senator from Missouri is the son of a distinguished father, and, in my opinion, if it had not been for the misfortunes of party political warfare, Champ Clark would have made one of the greatest Presidents this country ever had. I will say that I think the concern of the Senator from Missouri is commendable, but that I honestly believe that his worry is at least 95 percent not necessary. It concerns the amount of water for navigation in the Illinois River and in the Mississippi River from St. Louis to Cairo, as I understand it.

I have here a statement as to the amount of water in the Illinois River and in the Mississippi system, given by the Army engineers.

The Monongahela River is canalized for 131 miles, its entire length, with a total fall of 153 feet. The average low-water cubic feet per second is 200, and the river carries annually 25,000,000 tons of freight.

The Ohio River has 981 miles of canalized length, with a total fall of 429 feet, and a low-water flow of 1,100 cubic feet per second. It carries yearly a total of about 20,000,000 tons of freight.

Last year the Ohio River, with its tributaries, carried twice as much freight as that carried by the Panama Canal.

The Panama Canal, 51 miles of waterway, has a fall of 85 feet, and carries 1,300 cubic second-feet of water, and a tonnage averaging nearly 28,000,000 tons. When I said that the Ohio River carried 20,000,000 tons 2 years ago, that did not include the tributaries.

The Illinois River, with 291 miles of canalized waterway, with a fall of 165 feet, has a flow of cubic feet per second of 3,400 feet, with an estimated future tonnage of 10,000,000 tons.

It will be seen, therefore, that the 9-foot channel in the Illinois River has three times the amount of water necessary to provide a channel similar to that of the Ohio River, carrying 28,000,000 tons of freight. It will carry two and a half times the amount of water carried in the Panama Canal.

It seems to me that with that amount of water, there should be no concern as to a sufficiency of water for transportation purposes in a 9-foot channel in the Illinois River. However, I consulted, a year ago, General Brown, who was Chief of Army Engineers until recently, and he said that if there was ever any danger to the 9-foot channel in the Illinois River, his survey showed that it could be put beyond any possibility of a doubt, if necessary, by the construction of two or three dams in the Illinois River.

Referring now to the section from St. Louis to Cairo—if there is any doubt about that: Under the program now being formulated and carried into effect, we are going to control the flood waters of the Mississippi River and its tributaries at their sources rather than at the lower part of the river.

Mr. CLARK. Before the Senator passes that point, may I further interrupt him, Mr. President?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. I desire to suggest to the Senator from Minnesota that even admitting for the purposes of argument—which I by no means do—that a diversion of 1,500 second-feet at Chicago would be sufficient at the present time for a 9-foot channel through all seasons of the year, I should like to suggest to the Senator that there might come a time in the course of the development of the American Republic—which we all hope will continue to develop for years unnumbered—when the United States Government in its wisdom, and the Congress of the United States in its wisdom, would desire to construct an 18-foot channel for the Lakes-to-the-Gulf project, or a 24-foot channel. At the present time, under the hitherto existing state of the law, that would be a matter for Congress to determine, subject to protest, of course, by Canada, if Canada thought that we were unduly lowering the level of the Great Lakes; but under the treaty we are considering, our hands are forever tied, and the Canadian Government will have an absolute power of veto of any necessary future development of the Lakes-to-the-Gulf project.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. It had not occurred to me that anyone would want an 18-foot channel through the heart of the country. A channel deep enough for ships should be 25 to 30 feet deep. There is no necessity for bringing ships, however, up the Mississippi River or up the Illinois River to Chicago. After all, what you want in transportation is to be able to carry a load. On the 9-foot channel you can carry a load on barges about five times bigger than the average ocean freighter will carry on the ocean. Take a barge with a capacity of 2,000 tons; you lash one such barge to another. If you have a load for five barges you lash them together; if you have a load for seven you lash them together. It is not at all unusual on the Ohio River to carry a load of 14, 18, 20, 25, or 30 thousand tons. You cannot, however, do that on the Great Lakes with barges. You cannot do it on the ocean. You have to have ships, and you have to have deep channels. But you do not need a deep channel for barge transportation. I cannot conceive how within the imagination of any man there would ever be any necessity for a channel deep enough to carry ocean ships up the Mississippi River to Chicago and the Twin Cities.

Of course, I had not thought that matter over before, but as the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] brought the subject up, this came to my mind.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator from Minnesota has read the reservation proposed by Mr. CLARK, of Missouri, has he not?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. There are several reservations. I have not read them all.

Mr. McKELLAR. Would the Senator object if at this moment I read the reservation, for the purpose of asking a question? It is very short.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I shall be glad to have the Senator do so.

Mr. McKELLAR. This is a reservation submitted by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK.]

> The United States ratifies this treaty with the distinct understanding that both high contracting parties recognize the complete and unquestioned sovereignty of the United States over Lake Michigan as a lake lying wholly within the boundary of the United States, that the high contracting parties recognize that Lake Michigan is not a part of the boundary waters of the international boundary between the United States and Canada, and that any of the provisions of article VIII of this treaty to the contrary notwithstanding, the question of diversion of water from said lake and the amount of such diversion, as well as all other questions affecting said lake, shall be and remain under the complete and exclusive control of the United States.

The question I wish to ask the Senator from Minnesota is this: Does the Senator contend for a moment that Lake Michigan is a part of the boundary-line waters of the United States between the United States and Canada?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. No; I do not; and I cannot find any part of this treaty that makes it a boundary water.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am inclined to think that the treaty, without the reservation, would do so.

I also desire to ask a further question of the Senator from Minnesota. We have already constructed, at great cost and expense, a waterway from Chicago to the Gulf of Mexico, right through the heart of our country and through the richest valley, perhaps, that was ever known in the world. Having constructed that waterway, does not the Senator think that when we enter into a treaty with a foreign nation that might injuriously affect that waterway we should have a reservation to protect that waterway?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I cannot see how it is going to injure that waterway. I think it will complement it and will help it, because I think it will help the people of this country.

Mr. McKELLAR. I can understand that; but ought we not to provide in this treaty that the Mississippi Valley water between Chicago and the Gulf of Mexico shall not be interfered with by any agreement in this treaty? Can the Senator see any possible objection to having that reservation in this treaty?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. In my opinion, that matter is handled to my satisfaction in this treaty. I cannot share the apprehension of the Senator from Tennessee. Lake Michigan is mentioned in this treaty as a part of the Great Lakes system; but I find it nowhere referred to as part of the boundary waters, that changes the status that it had under the treaty of 1909, except as I have already mentioned.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator will permit another interruption. This treaty does provide in specific terms that Canada shall have the right to divert waters from the Georgian Bay into the St. Lawrence River. If that provision is made to protect Canada's canal, why should not, by the same token, a reservation be carried in this treaty protecting an all-American canal in the same way?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I cannot find that provision in the treaty. I wish the Senator, when he takes the floor in his own right, would go into that matter.

Mr. McKELLAR. I shall be very happy to do so.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. As well as the Senator from New York, I am trying to point out some of the objections that have been made to this treaty and answer them in my own simple way to the best of my ability.

Mr. President, I was going to say, when the Senator from Missouri interrupted me, that under our new program of flood control we are going to control the flood waters at the source, rather than the ineffectual program of controlling those waters after they get down to the lower Mississippi. In the first place, that seems to me to be the logical thing to do. If your kitchen floor is flooded with water from the faucet, it would seem ridiculous to dig ditches in the kitchen floor to get rid of the water. You would control it at the faucet. We are going to do that with the flood waters.

On the Missouri River we are going to hold back the flood waters, and on the other tributaries of the Mississippi River we are going to hold back the flood waters to keep them from doing damage in time of floods down in the lower part of the valley; and at the time of low water that water can be let out of the reservoirs and sent down the Mississippi, and engineers tell me that that will for all time make the 9-foot channel safe on the stretch of the Mississippi River from St. Louis to Cairo.

Of course, the question of impairment of our sovereignty has been mentioned here, but every treaty is an impairment of sovereignty. We give some privileges to another country, which gives some privileges to us.

I have mentioned some of the objections that have been made to this treaty, but the real objection—without reflecting upon Senators who have taken the floor to object to the treaty—the most powerful opposition in this country comes from an entirely different source. There has been a standardized propaganda against these waterways in this country for many, many years, and I have it here in condensed form and will have it printed in the RECORD.

Before a subcommittee holding hearings there appeared two men who are quite well known to Members of Congress. One was Mr. Thom, attorney for the railway executives; the other was a man by the name of Oliver, who said he spoke for the Railroad Securities Owners' Association. Mr. Thom always speaks for the railway executives. These gentlemen speak for the same crowd who were successful in having passed the Esch-Cummins Transportation Act; the same crowd who were able to bring about a reduction in railroad workers' pay a year ago that amounted to $180,000,000 a year. They speak for the banking crowd that have piled mortgage upon mortgage upon our railroad transportation systems since we began to build railroads, without making any provision for the amortization of the debt. They speak for that crowd who have come here to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and obtained hundreds of millions of dollars from that corporation, it is said, for the benefit of the railroads; but where did it go? It went to pay the interest to the bondholders and increased the debt of the railroads. Those are the people for whom these gentlemen speak.

It is well known that the railroads are controlled by the big bankers, just as the steel and oil and the other basic industries are controlled. These bankers have shown that they are not competent to operate banks, and, by the same token, I charge they are not competent to control and manage the basic industries of this country in such a way as they should be managed and controlled legitimately for the benefit of the people and for legitimately invested capital.

The people for whom Thom and Oliver spoke, and for whom they have spoken for years, are the people who have more than any others in this country been responsible for the national policies, industrial, financial, and political, that have brought this country to the condition in which it is today. It is useless to blame Republican or Democratic politicians, Members of the Congress, or Presidents for those policies; they have been only errand boys of these same interests and have obeyed their dictation. These same interests have also dominated our national policies since the Civil War. So these are the people for whom Mr. Thom and Mr. Oliver speak; and there is to be found the real opposition to the development of our inland waterways.

Mr. DIETERICH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Yes; I yield.

Mr. DIETERICH. I thought possibly the Senator was going to say something more about the exchange of sovereignty over different portions of waters involved in the St. Lawrence waterway system. The United States surrenders her sovereignty over the waters of Lake Michigan, being a lake entirely within the United States. What is the reason why the British Government and Canada did not surrender their sovereignty over the St. Lawrence River and of the Welland Canal, which are portions of the highway over which commerce under the pending treaty must pass? What is the reason they should retain their sovereignty and their complete control over that part of the St. Lawrence River lying in Canadian territory, and yet we surrender our sovereignty over a body of water that is entirely within our boundaries?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I deny that we give up any sovereignty over Lake Michigan except as to certain specific points as to water diversion, upon which we are agreed. In the St. Lawrence River we have perpetually the right to use its waters for navigation, and in the pending treaty there are certain provisions under which the Canadian Government shall maintain a certain water level.

Mr. DIETERICH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. DIETERICH. Does not the treaty fully protect the sovereignty of Canada in the absolute control of the St. Lawrence River, with the exception of the right on our part to navigate it? Should not that same arrangement apply to Lake Michigan?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I think it does, except as to the matter of the diversion of water; and I say that not only is Canada interested in that, but a number of States of the American Union brought suit against the State of Illinois because they are interested. Certainly it should not be said that Canada is not interested in the diversion of water, which might lower the level of the Lakes at the expense of her transportation, as New York, Michigan, and Minnesota and other States are interested.

Mr. DIETERICH. Will the Senator yield further on that point?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. DIETERICH. The Senator said that the fall in the Illinois River was 100 and some feet. Will he please again refer to those figures?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I said that the fall of the Illinois River was 165 feet in 291 miles.

Mr. DIETERICH. Does the Senator know in what part of the Illinois River that fall mainly takes place?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I presume at Lockport.

Mr. DIETERICH. Yes. There are 231 miles of the Illinois River from Utica to the mouth of the river, with a fall of only 29 feet. Practically the entire fall is above that point. Does the Senator realize that unless there was a sufficient volume of water passing down that entire even stretch of the river it would take an immense amount of money in order to keep the sediment, the deposit, cleaned out of the channel?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I have no knowledge of that except what the Army engineers advise me. I spoke to General Brown specifically two or three different times about that, because I was concerned about the matter, and, at least to my satisfaction, he convinced me that the Illinois River was very properly protected.

Mr. DIETERICH. They also convinced the people that the canal of the Sanitary District of Chicago was lowering the level of Lake Michigan and alarmed the cities along the lake, did they not? And is it not a fact that after that the lake rose to the highest level to which it ever was known to rise in its history?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. That may be true.

Mr. DIETERICH. Is the Senator familiar with that fact?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. That is an engineering question with which I do not pretend to be familiar.

Mr. DIETERICH. If the Senator will pardon me just one further question, the Senator said that the volume of water is 3,000 second-feet. What makes up that 3,000 second-feet? What is the normal natural low-water flow of the Illinois River exclusive of the increment turned into it by the sanitary commission?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. If I remember correctly, there is a pumpage of 1,500 feet. The Illinois River is made up of waters coming from several rivers diverted from Lake Michigan—the Chicago River and the Desplaines River, too. Is not that correct?

Mr. DIETERICH. Yes.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I am not very familiar with those conditions.

Mr. DIETERICH. May I say to the Senator I have been very much concerned about the Illinois River, and am familiar, to some extent, with the engineering features—that is, the hydraulic features of the river—and at low water the flow on the Illinois River, gathered from its tributaries, does not exceed 500 second-feet.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. The report I have from the engineers is that it carries 3,400 cubic feet per second.

Mr. DIETERICH. Is that the report of the Army engineers?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. It is the official statement of the Army engineers for all the rivers that are covered in this report.

Mr. DIETERICH. That is the natural flow of the river?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I presume so.

Mr. DIETERICH. Exclusive of the increment?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. What does the Senator mean by the "increment" of water?

Mr. DIETERICH. I mean the 1,500 second-feet eventually turned into it.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I assume it includes that.

Mr. DIETERICH. Yes.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. That would make up the total flow of the river. I expect the engineers in their figures have given the maximum flow of the river.

Mr. President, I was referring to the interests that control the railroads, the steel industry, and the other basic industries, and their opposition to the development of our inland waterways.

Mr. DIETERICH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further on that point?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. With all due respect to the Senator from Illinois, I desire to finish my remarks. I will be delighted to listen to the Senator when he takes the floor in his own right. These questions have been threshed out here on the floor time and time again since we began this discussion. I am trying to cover some subjects from a different point of view from that advanced in the arguments which have been presented, and I hope the Senator will bear with me. I want to finish some time this afternoon.

Mr. President, at the time I was interrupted I was speaking of the influences that have been in opposition to the development of our waterways, interests that have dominated our national policies and have brought the country to the condition in which it now is. Whether they be at the top or at the bottom, the whole force of it centers in the banking interests in the large financial centers of the country.

So far as the railroads are concerned, these interests seem to have three main ideas: One is to raise rates; another is to cut wages, and the third is to issue more mortgages and sell them to the public. They do not seem to worry about the people whom they are expected to serve, whether they be workers or consumers in the cities and the villages or on the farm; they are driving them to the poorhouse, pauperizing them, in order that they may collect on their capital—fictitious or legitimate, but largely fictitious—on these securities that have been sold either to innocent investors or piled up as liabilities against the savings of the people in the savings banks and life insurance companies which they control. Those are the people who are bringing the railroads, as well as the country in general, to ruin.

When he appeared before the committee Mr. Oliver said:

I am general counsel of the Security Owners' Association, a national organization composed of institutional and individual owners of railroad securities.

To introduce Mr. Oliver with his own introduction of himself to the committee is, I believe, sufficient. He claims to speak for those vast aggregations of wealth who by their control of railroad securities are able to dominate the entire situation as I have already outlined it. They are tied up through these securities and the banks with the hydroelectric power interests in the union, and they joined together, as they always have joined, to defend their interests for the exploitation of the people, with all of those forces and with the ports of the North Atlantic, in order to defeat the seaway.

Mr. Oliver then stated to the committee:

I might say that this is the same organization which was organized in 1917 and represented by Mr. S. Davies Warfield until the time of his death, in 1927, and then subsequently headed by Mr. Milton W. Harrison, and you will perhaps recall that it was quite active during 1919 and 1920 in connection with the passage of the Transportation Act.

I do not find any fault with Mr. Thom or Mr. Oliver for appearing here in behalf of these interests. These interests have a right to be heard, but their testimony must be weighed with the other testimony we have as to the influence of these interests and the policies they have foisted upon the American people. Their evidence must be weighed and considered accordingly. Evidently they are quite proud of the influence they had over the Congress in connection with the enactment of the Esch-Cummings law, otherwise called the "Transportation Act." They are here now to recall that they were here then, that they were busy, and that they are here again. I assume they feel that they have as much power now as they had then.

I need not insult the intelligence of Senators by asking them for whom these men speak, because they have already stated for whom they speak. Certainly they have their orders from those who pay their salaries and who collect those salaries and expenses out of the public in these constantly increasing freight rates.

When Mr. Oliver came before the committee and introduced himself as the spokesman for the Security Owners' Association there was a cross-examination to bring out what authority he had to speak for those people. I find that the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], a member of the subcommittee, asked him this question:

May I ask how many of these owners are there that you represent?

Mr. OLIVER. I really do not know, Senator.

Senator VANDENBERG. A large number?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes, sir. It is an organization maintained primarily by savings banks, some of the insurance companies, and in which there are also individual owners of securities.

Senator VANDENBERG. When you say you are authorized to voice their opposition to the waterway, how do you get your authority?

Mr. OLIVER. From the executive committee.

Senator VANDENBERG—

The Senator was still trying to get some information from the witness, so he inquired—

In other words, the membership has never passed on it?

Mr. OLIVER. I do not think the membership really has.

Senator VANDENBERG. So you are really expressing the views of the executive committee and not of the membership?

Mr. OLIVER. That is correct. The membership committee is composed of such men as Henry Bruere, president of the Bowery Savings Bank; Mr. Philip Benson, president of the Dime Savings Bank; Mr. Frederick E. Ecker, Jr., of the Metropolitan Life; and Mr. Loomis, of the Connecticut Mutual, and others whose names I do not have in mind at the present time.

He is not very familiar with the membership of the executive committee. He does not remember the names of all of them. He remembered the names of two or three. He was asked if he could furnish a list to the committee, and he said he would in time get it for the committee. But he did not know who were the members of the executive committee, although he went on to speak in opposition to the treaty. His argument is very much the same as was the argument of Mr. Thom, speaking for the railway executives.

The important fact to be borne in mind is that in this opposition to the treaty there was a definite hook-up between the executives of the railways, speaking for the banks through Mr. Thom, the railroad-securities owners, and all these vested interests of hydroelectric power throughout the country, people who hold the mortgages in such a vast watered quantity that it is very doubtful if at any time within the next hundred years wealth and income can be produced in the United States enough to pay the fixed charges.

Members of the Judiciary Committee will recall when Mr. Thom, the high-priced attorney, with his high-priced counsel and advisers, has appeared before that committee. I have no objection to that. He has to make a living. I have no personal feeling about Mr. Thom, but I desire to recall the instances when he has been here.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, before the Senator leaves the discussion of Mr. Oliver's testimony, will he yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DIETERICH in the chair). Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I should like to remind the Senator that Mr. Oliver finally was forced by Senator WALSH to admit that even from his own viewpoint, and from the viewpoint of the security holders whom he pretended to represent, at least the western railroads stood to gain an advantage from this seaway. He had to concede that even from his own viewpoint the pertinency of his observations was confined exclusively to the railroads east of the Great Lakes; and I think a perfectly sound and incontrovertible argument can be made that it is of no disadvantage even to the eastern railroads.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I intended to cover that subject a little later. I am sure the Senator from Michigan can add a great deal to my argument on the subject. I intend to quote the executives of western railroads and read what they said as to the great benefit that would result to the western railroads and to our part of the country from the building of the seaway; that is, they said that prior to the time their mouths were muzzled.

Getting back to Mr. Thom, I said that he appears frequently before our committees in Congress. We all know for whom he speaks. He appeared here at the time the Judiciary Committee held hearings on the so-called "labor injunction bill." He came here to defend the "yellow dog" contract. He came here in opposition to the labor injunction bill, and had a group of high-priced railroad attorneys with him. At the time the Congress passed that bill they had his testimony. They had weighed it. They found it prejudiced and biased, and the vote of the Congress shows the weight that they gave to his testimony. By the same token, I think we have a right to ask that his testimony shall be weighed now in the same balance as it was at that time.

It will be interesting to know how much of the public's money, collected in exorbitant freight rates, has been spent throughout the country in organizing taxpayers' leagues and economy leagues and citizens' transportation leagues to carry out and spread the misinformation prepared by the attorneys and propagandists of the power and transportation and banking interests. Of course, all of the money so spent is charged against the shippers and paid by the shippers and consumers and producers. I venture to say that the Economy League and the various tax leagues will not investigate the unseen taxes in exorbitant freight rates through which the people of this country are mulcted to pay the interest on fictitious watered stock and bonds of the railroad companies. Such leagues are not organized to attack the income of capital. They are organized to attack the income of the great mass of the people.

It is not necessary to go into the question of interlocking directorates, as was so vividly shown here a year ago with the map entitled "The Spider of Wall Street", which the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] had printed in the RECORD; but back of them all or on top of them all are these large international and national banking houses in the large financial centers.

The propaganda and the argument against the seaway is pretty much the same wherever we see it. In one of the prominent railway journals for January there is an article with a footnote which says:

From Association of Railway Executives.

The article is practically the same as the testimony given by Mr. Thom before the committee, and I assume it was prepared by him for the Association of Railway Executives. I ask unanimous consent that the article be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The article is as follows:

THE ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY PROJECT—CAN WE AFFORD IT?—DO WE NEED IT?

From Association of Railway Executives

1. To every suggestion of expenditure, whether it be large or small, by government or by individuals, these questions may be fairly applied:

Can we afford it?

Do we need it?

They are pertinent to the proposed St. Lawrence waterway project.

2. Can we afford it? The answer to this is to appraise the cost. The first and probably the lowest estimate is that of the Joint Board of Engineers, which estimates the cost at $543,429,000, of which the United States would pay $272,453,000. But experience tells us that preliminary engineering estimates are generally too low. The Panama Canal was estimated to cost $160,000,000 and did cost $533,000,000; the Suez Canal was estimated at $30,000,000 and did cost $80,000,000; the Welland Canal was estimated at $50,000,000; the actual cost, $128,000,000. The probability, therefore, is that the St. Lawrence work will cost us twice what the engineers figure. Thus, other engineering estimates have placed the cost at from $712,000,000 to $1,054,000,000, with the annual operating and maintenance costs at $42,704,000. This is the outlay proposed in the face of a Government economy program.

3. Do we need it? Proponents have estimated the maximum capacity of the waterway at 30,000,000 tons a year. A careful survey made a few years ago indicated that possible available tonnage under conditions prevailing at that time would not exceed 10,500,000 tons, of which 5,500,000 tons would come from the United States and 5,000,000 from Canada. Sixty percent of the tonnage was expected to be grain. However, the estimated exports of grain from the United States were put at 2,062,000 tons and of Canada at 4,300,000 tons; all United States exports at 2,600,000 tons and Canadian exports at 4,522,500 tons. Thus the proposed project, on the basis of the two Governments sharing the burden of expenses equally, would serve almost double the amount of Canadian exports as compared with the United States. And there is also the tariff policy of the United States with respect to imports.

4. The advocates of this waterway project have claimed a saving of 6 cents a bushel on wheat but evidence shows that wheat has been and is being hauled from the head of the Lakes for a charge of 4½ cents a bushel and less. Obviously 6 cents cannot be saved out of this.

5. Furthermore, there is no need for this additional transportation service, for the reason that adequate and efficient transportation facilities already exist to handle all traffic offered or will be offered in the foreseeable future. The construction of this waterway would mean additional, subsidized, and unneeded transportation service, and if successful, will only divert traffic from essential transportation facilities without savings in total cost.

6. Moreover, since the above estimates were made as to possible available tonnage for this waterway project, a national policy has developed looking to an immediate reduction and an ultimate elimination of an export surplus of wheat in the United States. Export wheat that would be available for the project from the fields in the United States has been decreasing during recent years in any case. Therefore, with respect to this 60 percent of the potential tonnage in estimates that have been made, the project, financed to one half of total cost from tax funds in the United States, would when completed be a subsidized service for the export of Canadian wheat and no advantage to the producer of wheat in the United States.

7. There is a broader aspect of the entire question, which has to do with the principles of equity and with the attitude of the Government toward the citizens of the country. It cannot be a fair and equitable principle for the Government to provide out of general tax funds for an additional and unnecessary transportation facility which will be a continued expense to the people of the whole country and will injure existing essential private enterprise, but can benefit, if at all, only a part of the people.

8. The matter may be boiled down to the following points:

(a) The actual cost of the St. Lawrence waterway will be much greater than the estimates show and upon which justification is based.

(b) Due to these underestimates and to other factors, there is certainly no sound reason to anticipate that the alleged savings from transportation service can be realized.

(c) The costs, whatever they may prove to be, will be borne in large part by taxpayers, and thus establish a subsidized service competitive with the rail carriers so essential in public service and from participation in which the rail carriers are prohibited by definite legislative action.

(d) The tonnage diverted to this artificial and subsidized waterway—

(1) If as great in amount as claimed by proponents, the project will result in unjustifiable injury to the railroads of the United States;

(2) If less in amount than claimed by proponents, the project fails of justification.

(e) The transportation service to be offered by this proposed waterway will be an incomplete service, limited—

(1) By climatic conditions to 6½ or 7 months out of the 12;

(2) By the purpose to handle business on through-haul only, disregarding local service.

(f) The railroads, therefore, although offering an essential public service, will be compelled to stand by with unused equipment and watch a subsidized competitor take the cream of the traffic during its operating season and will be required to be ready and fully equipped to serve when winter closes the waterway and railroad operation is more difficult and to serve all who cannot use the services of this subsidized competitor.

(g) There is no present or prospective need for the proposed additional, duplicate service because—

(1) There are no sound reasons to anticipate that there will be any savings in cost to be realized;

(2) Existing facilities are adequate, dependable, efficient, and afford full community, all-year-round service.

(h) The proposed project will result in a tax-free, unregulated transportation agency competitive with heavily taxed and regulated railroads.

(i) It will involve the use of public revenues raised by taxation of all the people for the special benefit of a part of the people only, and to the detriment of competing sections, thus violating a sound general principle in government, namely, that revenues raised by taxation from all the people should not be used for the benefit of some of the people only to the detriment of others.

(j) Since the proposed waterway project runs for a long distance through foreign territory, it will most surely involve international complications in case of a war wherein the interests of the United States and Canada are not identical.

9. The inescapable answers to the two questions—Can we afford it? and Do we need it?—are:

We do not need the St. Lawrence waterway.

We cannot afford the St. Lawrence waterway.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. What do these opponents of ratification say is wrong with the treaty, and where do they get their information about the treaty and its provisions? Where do they get their information about the economic effects of the treaty and the probable cost of the treaty?

They challenge the reports of the Army engineers. They challenge the report of every commission, whether Canadian or American, that has for years and years studied this problem; and they get their information from a book gotten out by the Brookings Institution, financed by the Carnegie Foundation and lending itself from time to time to the study of problems that pay the freight. The title of the book is "The St. Lawrence Navigation and Power Project", and it carries the authors names as Harold G. Moulton, Charles S. Morgan, and Adah L. Lee.

The text of the book, asserted by the railroads to be authoritative, finds that the economists who have made careful study of the necessity for and the advantages of the seaway are wrong; it finds that the Joint Board of Engineers of the two Nations are wrong; it finds that the studies made by the Department of Commerce, to say nothing of the exhaustive studies just brought to the attention of this Senate together with the treaty, are wrong; that the facts bearing upon the commercial need and commercial use of the seaway are wrong. It finds that the engineers, both Federal and for the State of New York, who have studied the power problem, are wrong. In fact, according to this book, the whole set-up of evidence gathered during the past decade and more of intensive study of the need and effects of this great international problem by the Dominion, on the one hand, and by the United States, on the other; from the engineering standpoint by the State of New York, with respect to power development; and by the 23 associated States of the Midwest independently and in their own behalf is completely, totally wrong, and is swept out of the window.

From the facts before us it appears that the entire railroad argument against the seaway runs back to the arguments made in this text. There is substantial reason to believe that the railroads, finding nowhere solid ground to support for their contentions—either in the reports of the engineers or in those of the economists of the Department of Commerce or in the International Joint Commission report of 1920 underlying the entire study—deliberately set out to manufacture their own argument; and if so, they found a worthy instrument.

The subcommittee of the Committee on Foreign Relations gave careful attention to the status of this gentleman, Dr. Harold G. Moulton, whose name stands at the head of the list of those lending their authority to the antiseaway argument; and after considering it thoroughly they dismissed it and all its pretensions in the following scathing language, written by the very much beloved, very able, and honest Senator Walsh of Montana. About this book he said:

> A book issued by the Brookings Institution, the work of Professor Moulton, has been much relied upon as an authority against the enterprise. It is the understanding that Professor Moulton is a statistician and neither an engineer, an operator of ships, a shipper, nor a rate expert. His facts, as well as his conclusions in many particulars, are disputed by thoroughly well-informed witnesses appearing before the subcommittee, all specialists in their particular line. The Army engineers scout the fears he expresses concerning costs; the shipmasters, what he says about the inadequacy of a 27-foot channel to meet the requirements of such ships as would be likely to traverse the seaway to be improved.

I do not believe that the late Senator from Montana would have treated Mr. Moulton or his book in the manner he has done in this language if the book had not earned that kind of treatment. There is no man, since I came to the Senate, who has treated one who did not agree with him with greater respect than did the late Senator Walsh, of Montana.

I submit further that every bit of the testimony offered by the railroads against the seaway goes to show the deliberate manufacture and setting up of antiseaway arguments under the name and guise of a great institution, for the simple and sole reason that nowhere else could they find any authority; nowhere else could they discover any legitimate argument than that manufactured to their need and to their order.

The latest revised cost figures of the United States Army Engineers, submitted together with the treaty, show a total cost to the United States amounting to $272,453,000, which cost includes the development of the share of power which belongs on this side of the International Rapids and is to be taken over under the terms of the joint resolution which has already passed the House of Representatives of the State of New York, at the figure of $89,726,750, leaving the net Federal cost of the entire project under the treaty at $182,726,250. These cost estimates are based upon the high construction costs obtaining during the middle of the last decade, while construction costs at the present time are notably lower.

The total Canadian cost already expended and to be paid out, divided into the four major items of the Welland ship canal, $128,000,000; the Thousand Islands section, $772,000, which sums are already expended; the necessary improvements of the Beauharnois and Lachine section, wholly within Canadian territory, $82,954,000; together with $59,250,000 cost of construction assumed in the International Rapids section, brings the Canadian estimated expenditures up to $270,976,000. I am sorry the Senater from New York [Mr. COPELAND] is not here, because he asked for the detail of those figures, and I asked him to wait. The Province of Ontario, like the State of New York, assumes that portion of the cost which pertains to power developed on the Canadian side of the international section. This brings the total, in round figures, up to $543,000,000; and the engineers have even gone our radio friend, "Andy", one better. The figures have not only been checked and double checked but they have been re-double checked—checked against the final construction costs of the Welland Canal, checked against the cost of excavation and improvement in the Great Lakes channels, checked against present engineering construction costs in other works, and rechecked and double rechecked for possible contingencies—and stand as the last word of the ablest body of experts in engineering plans and cost studies to be found anywhere on the continent.

But against this carefully estimated cost of $543,000,000, of which the United States Federal Government is to assume less than $183,000,000, Dr. Moulton says that it will cost $712,000,000. We leave it to the statistician of the railroads to find out how he arrives at his opinion. Going along from a basic cost estimate manufactured, not from original engineering studies and reports but by a statistical process, the railroads bolster Dr. Moulton's assertion of costs by a reminder that the Panama Canal was estimated to cost $160,000,000 and did cost $533,000,000.

It has been said on the floor of the Senate that the Panama Canal cost more than the original estimates. The original estimate of cost was based upon an entirely different plan from that finally decided upon for the building of the Canal. The plans were changed, and in the cost of building the Canal there was the cost of clearing up the Panama Canal Zone, getting rid of yellow fever, and building sanitary works and fortifications. The actual building of the Canal, under the plan that was finally consummated, cost some million dollars less than the estimate in the engineers' report, as was shown by the official figures of the Army engineers and of the War Department, quoted yesterday by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG].

We are told by the railroads that the Welland Canal was estimated to cost $50,000,000, but actually cost $128,000,000. The building of that canal was stopped during the war; it was delayed, and every conceivable cause for increased cost was piled upon that undertaking.

Finally we are told that the estimated cost of the international section development is keyed back by the engineers directly to the actual cost figures of the completed Welland Canal construction.

Many figures have been quoted as to these costs, but no detailed information is brought to us from any responsible source based on adequate and sufficient investigation.

The Army engineers built the Panama Canal, and they have done our river and harbor work. The development of the rivers has been a disgrace, but I maintain that that was not the fault of the Army engineers; it is the fault of Congress and national administrations for the piecemeal, pork-barrel appropriations, and methods of construction. It was not the fault of the Army engineers.

The cry of the railroads is, Do we need this canal? They say no, and again they base their estimates upon a statistician who is neither engineer, a shipowner, a traffic expert, nor rate expert.

Dr. Moulton finds a possible 10 or 11 million tons of commerce using the seaway. That is but little, very little, in excess of what is actually passing through the limited 14-foot locks of the Canadian canals and the St. Lawrence at the present time. I believe that it is impossible for anyone to estimate correctly the future tonnage that will pass through this projected waterway, because the possibilities are beyond the imagination of any man.

Rather than accept the summary of conclusions of the railroad statistician, upon whom Mr. Thom and the railroads as a whole based their argument of enough traffic, I prefer to base my opinion upon the conclusion of the Interdepartmental Board on the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence project, reporting on January 10, 1934. They predicted a possible overseas movement through the seaway of 13,000,000 tons per year, with a saving in the annual transportation costs as compared with the present available routes of approximately $79,000,000. This is exclusive of intercoastal traffic, which, it is the considered judgment of the interdepartmental committee, will be the major source of tonnage entering into and going out of the Great Lakes. If the overseas traffic is only 20 percent of the domestic traffic that will come as a result of that seaway, we have some estimate of the total traffic and the amount of freight that will move which cannot move now because of high transportation costs.

Freight, at the present prices of commodities, the present purchasing power of the American people, and the present high rates, cannot move from the Atlantic seaboard to the interior of the country in exchange for other commodities because the traffic will not bear this exchange of goods. The goods are too low in price. That is particularly and specifically true of farm products. The freight rates are too high, so that goods do not move, and consequently our commerce suffers and railroad men are idle. Therefore at the present time we are spending out of the Federal Treasury millions and millions of dollars in an effort to revive commerce, the movement of freight, and exchange of goods.

I have here on the wall a map showing the inland waterways of Germany, a small country, with the finest system of railroads, possibly, in the world. The railroads are owned by the Government, but in spite of the fact that the German Government owns that fine system of railways, with trains averaging 90 miles an hour, which parallel the waterways of Germany, Germany finds it profitable for the development of her industries and the welfare of her people to spend hundreds of millions of dollars to develop waterways into every part of the country, because in Germany and France and Belgium and Holland no industry can afford to operate unless it is located on water, so that it can get on the sea. From the inland of Germany goods are loaded on barges, go down to the sea, are loaded onto ships, transported across the Atlantic through the Panama Canal, and are distributed at the port of Seattle, at transportation rates lower than are charged for goods shipped 2,000 miles by rail from the Mississippi Valley to the Pacific coast. They can beat us in competition from the interior of France and Germany and Belgium on account of their waterways and water transportation. They can beat us in competition on the Pacific coast, not speaking of the Atlantic, because of the waterway transportation.

It is said that we are so far north at the outlet that climatic conditions would hamper us, and that we cannot transport goods so far north. Montreal is located at this point on the map [indicating]. Montreal has a larger import and export traffic into its harbor than any other city on the western continent, with the exception of New York City. I think that answers that argument.

The Canadian Government owns the national railways of Canada, running into the heart of Chicago, of course, operating the railroads under the regulations of the United States Government, and under the police power of the United States Government, which is as it should be. The Canadian Government has just completed a railroad from Edmonton to the Hudson Bay, and that puts the city of Winnipeg on the border of the United States, right in the center of the country, 1,200 miles nearer Liverpool than is Winnipeg or Minneapolis going by rail to the Atlantic coast. Unless this part of the United States [indicating] gets an outlet to the sea, it is very logical to believe that we will take the other way and go through the Hudson Bay. Those who fear that the railroads of the United States will suffer had better think of what that will do for the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National Railways.

I quote now from an article I had printed in the RECORD, an article prepared by the railway executives' counsel. It says:

> The advocates of this waterway project have claimed a saving of 6 cents a bushel on wheat, but evidence shows that wheat has been and is being hauled from the head of the Lakes for a charge of 4½ cents a bushel and less. Obviously 6 cents cannot be saved out of this.

It is true that during the depression, owing to a lack of cargoes, there have been unusual rates on the Great Lakes, but the gentleman who made this argument must have gotten his economic information from those who are in the habit of playing a shell game with the American people. I am reliably advised that sight is entirely lost of current overseas rates from Gulf ports to Europe and the relatively equal distance of these Gulf ports from Liverpool with those of the Great Lakes to the same key destination in western Europe. The railroad opposition to the seaway in its non-freight savings argument deliberately forgets that the rate from Gulf ports to Europe may be taken as a fairly safe yardstick of what the freights from ports like Duluth, Milwaukee, Chicago, and the many other ports of the Great Lakes will be, and they deliberately ignore the existing rates from Montreal to Liverpool, and that the total route length rate will be only an extension of this rate, made in proportion to the extension of the distance in total sea miles. This extinguishes the entire argument based on present costs of movement from head of the Lakes to Montreal, and sets up a broad-gaged and absolutely correct picture of how future rates on overseas movement will be determined.

Mr. President, the article prepared by the Association of Railway Executives lays great stress on the injury that this seaway will do to the railroads. I beg to submit, Mr. President, that throughout this territory of the United States the seaway will bring a water terminal of the sea to their terminal here and all the western railroads carrying freight to water. I leave it to the Senators, who see the map which I have placed on the wall, as to how those western railroads, particularly the western and southern railroads who will carry freight either to the seaway here or to the Gulf coast, can be injured.

The western railroads, through their executives, when the first report of the seaway treaty was made public, were all in favor of it. I am not going to take the time to read the statements that were made by them at that time, but I ask unanimous consent that statements by Edward Pennington; Ralph Budd, president of the Great Northern Railroad; S. M. Felton, president of the Chicago Great Western Railroad; Hale Holden, at that time president of the Burlington; A. H. Scandrett, president of the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railroad; Howard Elliott, of the Northern Pacific; Mr. Sargent, of the Chicago & North Western Railroad; and Mr. Byram, also of the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railroad, be printed in the RECORD, without taking the time to have them read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

> In 1920, when the seaway was a new project, Edward Pennington, speaking before the international joint committee then investigating its possibilities, said:
> "Water transportation has always been and will always be the cheapest and most reliable transportation of the world at all times, and this Great Lakes-St. Lawrence water project seems to be one that should be encouraged in every way possible. * * * I think it would be a great thing for the Northwest and Canada to shorten the rail haul. It would have the same beneficial effect on the Northwest as the Panama Canal has had on the Pacific coast cities and coast States."
> In the same year Ralph Budd, president of the Great Northern, gave it as his opinion that—
> "The benefits accruing to the middle and northwest sections of the United States as a result of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence tidewater project cannot help being apparent to anyone who has given the subject consideration."
> And in 1923 he added:
> "* * * Our trouble is that the West, and especially the Northwest, is sacrificed in order to make an exceptionally favorable showing in the East. Of course, this cannot continue indefinitely."
> In 1923 Mr. S. M. Felton, president of the Chicago Great Western Railroad, expressed his opinion that—
> "I am heartily in accord with the project, but I do not believe it is wise to attempt to carry it out on a 25-foot channel. We must go to 30 feet or not at all, because by the time the canal is completed a 25-foot channel will be out of date. * * * We will need the best possible facilities to make the program a success."
> We have compromised with Mr. Felton on his 30-foot channel. We have gone down to 27 feet with the sills placed at 30. All that will be needed to secure the 30-foot channel will be the necessary additional excavation, if and when the time of necessity shall arise. At present the 27-foot channel will amply provide for the vast majority of tonnage that may be expected to use the St. Lawrence-ocean road.
> Again Mr. Felton spikes the guns of those who say the seaway is a seasonal affair by remarking on this point:
> "Lines which reach the Gulf from the West naturally would not favor it, but lines that reach Chicago and terminate here certainly should favor it, and I do not see wherein there would be any great opposition on the part of our eastern connections at Chicago. We have always in season worked the lake-and-rail business and the lake-and-canal business, and I do not see why we shouldn't work with the Great Lakes project, where it is for our interest to do so."

Hale Holden, when president of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy, said:

"I view the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence tidewater project as a matter of the highest interest and importance to the development of the middle and northwestern territory, comparable only to the Panama Canal in its wide-spread and beneficial results."

A. H. Scandrett, president of the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railroad, in 1929, after the seaway project had been under consideration for 9 years, said:

"The movement in volume of export and import traffic from and to eastern termini of western railroads would unquestionably be of benefit to those railroads and the territory which they serve."

Howard Elliott, who wrote his name into transportation history, both in the West and in the East as well, said before the Harvard Club, of New York City, when chairman of the Northern Pacific Railway:

"This (the seaway) is a great national project, national in scope and influence. * * * The project will be beneficial to New England and to all the country tributary to the Great Lakes. It will relieve congestion on the railroads reaching the upper Atlantic ports when population and industry are twice what they are today. The project will help coastwise trade, export, and import trade between the Middle Western States and foreign countries and give great opportunity to our merchant marine fleet."

Fred Sargent, then president of the Chicago Northwestern Railway Co., held to the view that:

"The Great Lakes-St. Lawrence waterway will help the Middle West. Anything that will help promote the prosperity of the inland empire between the Alleghenies and the Rockies will help the railroads and will be of inestimable value to the entire country."

And, finally, we have the opinion of H. E. Byram, who as president of the then in receivership Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul, exercised the option held by that road to purchase from the Northern Pacific Railroad a half interest in its terminals at Duluth and its lines between the head of the Lakes and St. Paul and Minneapolis. A major factor in reaching the conclusion to exercise the option was the belief that lake ports would soon be made ocean ports and the Milwaukee desired an outlet to the sea on Lake Superior as well as on Lake Michigan. Explaining the expenditure involved, Mr. Byram said in a public address in Duluth:

"We are heartily in sympathy with the development of the waterway. We are not afraid of it as competition. We are confident that the waterway will come and that is why we want a foot on the doorstep of Duluth. It was a considerable influence in bringing us to our conclusion. * * * It is useless to fight such an improvement for our country. On the contrary, we expect to share in the great business that will come with the opening of the Great Lakes to the sea. We are desirous of sharing in the traffic that must come through this port and for that reason have decided to cast our lot with you and share in the prosperity that will be yours."

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. As a matter of fact, Mr. President, instead of doing these railroads any injury it should be a great help to them. One of the executives of the railroads in question said that, on account of the joint rates that had been made, the western railways had always suffered. The western railroads are suffering now because that part of the country is going back. People and industry are leaving that part of the country, and that always hurts the railroads. We have got to get transportation facilities in order that the economic situation will be so relieved that people and industry and capital can come back to the Mississippi Valley. That is the bread basket of the country, and the policies under which we have been suffering for the last 15 years are ruining that part of the country. You cannot have a big nation and break its backbone right down the center of its back.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I yield.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. On the point that the Senator was making that this seaway would not injure the railroads, I should like to point out that between 1920 and 1929, when competition on both water and highway was growing rapidly, the railroads paid on the average in that period $1,000,000,000 a year in the form of interest and dividend payments.

I should also like to direct the Senator's attention to the fact that during the period when the traffic through the Panama Canal was growing from 4,888,454 tons in 1915 to 30,663,006 tons in 1929, the western railroads, which may be said to be most nearly in competition with the Panama Canal, had the best earnings of any period in their history, and that in 1929 they had a net of $336,000,000, which exceeded any peak year prior to the opening of the Panama Canal.

In other words the Panama Canal had been carrying the heavy, bulky, low-revenue-producing freight; but the cheap transportation of that type of freight has resulted in an increase in the high-revenue type of freight carried by those roads which are operating in competition with the Panama Canal.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I thank the Senator.

I was going to say in reference to the quotations from executives of western railroads which have been printed in the RECORD, that that is what they said. They have now, according to Mr. Thom, changed their minds. But before going into his explanation of that change I desire to refer to the map on the wall for a minute, because the other day the question of damage to the railroads was brought up, and the question of compensatory traffic was injected into the debate.

It must be quite apparent to anyone that if freight is to come from all parts of the world to these lake ports, that the ships cannot travel over the land carrying that freight in competition with the railroads. Someone has got to handle that freight. If, because of low commodity prices and high transportation rates now that feright cannot move—if it can be hoped to move it, it will have to be moved inland and, under the provisions of the Interstate Commerce Act and various acts and amendments thereto, the railroads will have to give joint and proportional rates in connection with water transportation, so the people in the hinterland will get the benefit of these joint proportional rates. It is quite evident that if this country can be revived and relieved of this economic situation, we can buy more of the goods from the various parts of the country, and commerce will be stimulated.

As the best evidence on that score, I have here an exhaustive article that I am not going to take the time to read, but on the subject of the effect of the waterway upon this territory [indicating on map] tributary to the seaway area, it shows that beneficial effects will inure even to the population of Tennessee and North Carolina. It is prepared and printed from data printed in bulletin 39, published by the Bureau of Railroad Economics and published in October 1930, covering the calendar year 1929. I might read a few lines to indicate the nature of the document, and I hope Senators who are interested will take the time to read it entire in the RECORD. It says:

In 1929, a normal year from the standpoint of consumer demand, the number of cars of fruits and vegetables originating outside of the Great Lakes trade region amounted to 530,066. Of this number, 201,433, or 38 percent, were unloaded and distributed within the Great Lakes trade territory. This disregards all movement other than by rail carriers.

Then the article goes on to explain the great benefits to come by the building of the seaway. I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MURPHY in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The article referred to is as follows:

In 1929, a normal year from the standpoint of consumer demand, the number of cars of fruits and vegetables originating outside of the Great Lakes trade region amounted to 530,066. Of this number, 201,433, or 38 percent, were unloaded and distributed within the Great Lakes trade territory. This disregards all movement other than by rail carrier.

The seaway territory unloaded and consumed 42 percent of the fruits and vegetables marketed by Washington, 32 percent of Oregon's supply, 36 percent of the immense fruits and vegetables trade of California, 47 percent of that of Arizona, 31 percent of that of New Mexico, 47 percent of Colorado's fruits and vegetables export, 39 percent of the similar shipments from Utah, 62 percent of those from Wyoming, 59 percent of the shipments from Idaho, and 36 percent of the cars of fruits and vegetables loaded within and shipped out of western Montana.

This is traffic that inevitably moves over western railway lines into midcontinental consuming territory. The increase of consuming power within the Great Lakes region must inevitably increase the trade movement from the West and Southwest into seaway territory, and such movement must inevitably set up a counter rail movement in the westward direction. One cannot escape the conclusion that the western roads and their employees have everything to gain and nothing to lose by the coming of the seaway.

The movement of fruits and vegetables from the Southern States into the seaway territory pictures a similar condition. Of these commodities Texas sold, in 1929, 54 percent of its exports within seaway territory, 87 percent of Oklahoma's output went into the same region, 81 percent of Arkansas' fruits and vegetables crop moved northward into seaway territory, 66 percent of Louisiana's crop found its way to northern markets, 36 percent of Mississippi's crop, 65 percent of that of Alabama, 77 percent of the fruits and vegetables shipped out of Tennessee, 54 percent of the Georgia melon and other fruits and vegetables crop, 31 percent of that of Florida found markets north of the Ohio.

This is a picture that does not indicate loss of trade to these railroads when the seaway becomes a reality and when the stimulus of an ocean trade route begins to move the trade activities, the curve of population growth, and the buying power of the seaway territory, upward.

The States south of the Potomac may be assumed for the moment to have but small concern in the seaway. But what does the fruits and vegetables shipment "index" indicate? We find that of the car shipments of fruits and vegetables moving out of South Carolina, 16 percent find their way across the Alleghenies and into the trade region of the seaway. The car movement from North Carolina is even stronger—29 percent of its entire fruits and vegetables crop is distributed within the markets around the Great Lakes. West Virginia, standing on the border line between the Great Lakes trade territory and that of the Atlantic coast, markets 61 percent of its fruits and vegetables in the Great Lakes region. Virginia, in spite of the pull of the great cities of the North Atlantic and the seasonal demand for fruits and vegetables desired by the South Atlantic States and Cuba, sends 30 percent of her fruits and vegetables output into and beyond the valley of the Ohio.

The interregional trade of the Atlantic coast region south of the Potomac is an index to a great unrecognized, unrealized interregional movement between the Atlantic coast and the interior that is not one of fruits and vegetables alone, but that takes in every product produced in the one region or the other.

It is clear from the percentages given that the railroads of the South Atlantic trade region, like those of the Gulf, of the inter-Mountain States, and of the Pacific coast have a deep concern in the prosperity and in the buying power of the interior of the continent. Most certainly none of these rail carriers will in any manner be injured by the seaway. The opposite effect—the upbuilding of interregional rail traffic—is indicated.

The Atlantic coast States north of the Potomac, it might be supposed, would not be particularly concerned in the marketing of their fruits and vegetables outside of the territory adjacent to that coast—outside of the great marketing centers of Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and the lesser cities that make up the many millions of consumers in that great consuming region of the Nation. But the percentage figures for the car-lot movement of fruits and vegetables moving out of that region and into the Great Lakes trade territory tell a different story—a story that points significantly to the close interrelationship existing between the North Atlantic coast region and the interior.

Maryland, the most southern of these States, sends 25 percent of her car-lot shipments of fruits and vegetables into the vast consuming territory west and north of the Ohio. The farmers of the small State of Delaware find a market for 44 percent of their fruits and vegetables in the region from Pittsburgh west. Pennsylvania markets 42 percent of its farm produce crops in the seaway area; New Jersey, 37 percent; New York, 22 percent; Massachusetts, 15 percent; New Hampshire, 12 percent; and the State of Maine, farthest of all the Eastern States from the Great Lakes trade region, sends 19 cars of fruits and vegetables out of every 100 loaded within its boarders into the trade territory of the Great Lakes.

WHAT THE "INDEX" GOES TO SHOW

What does all this mean except that when one attempts to analyze the actual situation he discovers moving into the seaway area from all directions a vast volume of perishable products necessary to the health and the well-being of the 50,000,000 people who constitute the consumers within that area, giving to the producing regions outside of it a market that contributes to the ordinary prosperity and growth of these regions? Nor can this be confined to one-way traffic alone. Out from the seaway area into all the States there moves constantly over every line of railroad, car-lot shipments that give tonnage volume to these rail lines and that in the aggregate make for the prosperity of the railroads, while at the same time they contribute to the growing prosperity of the Nation as a whole.

The showing that is made for fruits and vegetables has been called an "index." It is precisely that. It indicates an important interregional movement for each and every commodity produced without and within the seaway territory. It holds true for cotton, it holds true for tobacco, it is true for lumber. It holds true for all the many products of the factories both within and outside of the seaway region. It indexes the interregional traffic developing from the mines of the West and the South and the East. It indicates an intracontinental movement that needs only to be called to the attention of the reader to make self-evident the truth that the prosperity of the railroads as a whole and the security of their employees' jobs can only be permanently secured by first assuring the prosperity and buying power of the people served by the rails, and the prosperity of the people depends upon their ability to produce and reach wide markets at a profit.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I should like to bring this thought to the Senator's attention: It seems to me that the great fundamental mistake which is made by the railroads and by railroad labor in assessing this project is this, that the railroads and railroad labor look about them in 1934 and find conditions depressed; they find traffic at a minimum and railroad employment at a minimum, and they arrive at their opinion in respect to the seaway in relation to these 1934 conditions. When they do that, I can readily understand how, in the face of 1934 conditions, they might find the prospectus discouraging; but I call the Senator's attention to the fact that it will take 8 years to build this seaway, and we should consider traffic and transportation conditions in the United States as they will exist prospectively in 1942. That is the test of whether or not this project is inimical to the railroads or to railroad labor. It is not fair to measure the effect of this undertaking in terms of 1934 conditions. We must project our vision ahead to 1942.

Certainly, conditions in 1942 in the United States are not going to be the same as they are in 1934 or we will not have any United States. It is the 1942 picture upon which railroad labor, for example, should focus its eyes.

I do not blame railroad labor, as it looks about it at the present time and sees half its membership unemployed, being easily frightened by some contemplated competitive system of transportation; but there is not a thing in the pending project which, even under adverse circumstances, can take a single job away from a single railroad man until 1942. I think they totally overlook that fact. Between now and 1942 the natural traffic development of the country is bound to overtake any slack which now exists.

If the Senator will permit me in his time, I emphasize this point by simply quoting two sentences from the official report sent down by the President of the United States. I read:

According to the Interstate Commerce Commission figures—

The trend would indicate a demand for about 650,000,000,000 ton-miles of freight traffic in 1950, an increase of 200,000,000,000 ton-miles as compared with the 1929 peak.

That is an estimate of the expansion up to 1950. The expansion up to 1942 would certainly be 100,000,000,000 ton-miles.

Then, here is a further sentence:

A similar analysis based on population growth and increase in per capita ton-miles of traffic suggests approximately the same conclusion and warrants the conviction—

This is an official statement sent to us by the President of the United States upon the authority of the Interstate Commerce Commission—warrants the conviction that by 1950 the increase in traffic offered to the country's transportation agencies will be at least 30 times the probable traffic via the seaway.

In other words, when we project our vision ahead we see a situation in which 30 times the traffic to be developed by the seaway, is, in the natural course of events, going to be developed on the country's other transportation agencies.

Begging the Senator's pardon again for interrupting him at this length, I urge particularly upon railroad labor and upon the railroads that they think of this project in terms of 1942 instead of in terms of 1934. I thank the Senator.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I thank the Senator. I think we should ask not only railway labor but the opposition to the treaty and in general the people of the United States to look ahead 8 or 10 or 15 years and build for the future. It may be asking a great deal of anyone to look that far ahead, but if we had been able to do that 15 years ago, we would not have sponsored and encouraged the policies that brought the country to the condition in which it is now.

Comte said that in order to be fit to govern a man must be able to foresee the future. Upon that basis of measurement, I must say that we have been found guilty of not being able to rule, because we have not been able to see 8 or 10 years into the future. However that may be, Mr. President, the quotations I sent to the desk from statements of executives of the western railroads show that since the time they previously spoke they have changed their minds. They explained in extenso why they were in favor of the seaway and were enthusiastic in making public addresses explaining how it would help the western railroads and the great midcontinent area from the Alleghenies to the Rockies. In my opinion, their foresight was better then than now. Mr. Thom says they have changed their minds. Before I quote from Mr. Thom I wish to say that I believe the railroad executives of the western roads are as able railroad men as there are in the country. They are not the owners of the railroads; they do not control the railroads; they have to act as the agents of those who control them and necessarily must at times change their minds and the opinions which they previously held.

When Mr. Thom was before the committee he assumed to speak, also, for the midwestern roads. I submit he could only do so by order of the bankers who control the midwestern railroads.

However, after making the statement which I will quote, in the middle of his testimony before the committee he was questioned as to why these railroads were opposed to the seaway. He said:

Because their careful consideration—of the proposed project of the St. Lawrence shipway has led to the conviction that the project is not necessary and is not economically sound, and they are now voicing their opposition to it. I have made the foregoing statement on behalf of the railroads.

Speaking of the executives—

Here come men, speaking for those who have managed the finances of the railroads in such a way that the very life of the railroads is now being threatened, and talk about economic soundness! They are responsible for policies which have been foisted upon this country in the name of economic soundness, and they still have the effrontery to talk as though they were experts in the matter of economic soundness.

Senator VANDENBERG questioned Mr. Thom, and asked:

Do you speak for all of the claims of all railroads?

Mr. Thom says:

Yes, sir.

Then Mr. Thom continues:

This matter has been considered by these very men (the western railway executives) and they have come to the conclusion that whatever may have been their views in the past * * * this is a sound position, and they authorized it. * * * Mr. Donnelly feels that way. * * * Mr. Scandrett feels that way. * * * Mr. Jaffray feels that way.

Senator VANDENBERG. And does Mr. Sargeant?

Mr. THOM. Yes, sir.

Senator WALSH of Montana. And Mr. Gray?

Mr. THOM. Yes, sir. * * *

When they spoke of the seaway they spoke for themselves. When they were told to shut up and change their minds, Mr. Thom came down to the committee and spoke for them. The question is, What "happened in the dark" to cause them to change their minds? He just tells us that they did change their minds, but gives no reason for their change of mind.

In November 1930 the association of railroad executives made a declaration of public policy deemed necessary to the continuance of adequate transportation service to the public. Since that day no western executive has had a voice of his own and no southern rail executive has dared to speak. Their voices have been silent and the only voice heard with respect to the seaway project has been the single voice of the great carrier lines connecting the Great Lakes ports and the Atlantic, speaking solely for themselves and against anything and everyone, including the western and southern railroads and their laborers, that might benefit by reason of the seaway.

The entire argument presented before the subcommittee of the Foreign Relations Committee by the railroads was territorially bounded by the Hudson River on the east, by the Ohio River on the south, and by the Great Lakes ports on the West. It was not even inclusive of all the carrier lines in the argument pleading the necessity for the railroads and did not include even all the carriers of the region to which I have referred as having been included. Even if everything they say should prove to be true, by the end of 8 or 10 years when this seaway shall have been completed there will have been enough of the old railroad laborers died to take up the unemployment, and the slack that might come even if what Mr. Thom says were true, but the truth of which I deny. Why should the railroad laborer working today worry? He has 10 years before this project can be completed. Suppose there is no increase in freight on the railroads of the United States, yet if everything Mr. Oliver and Mr. Thom say is true, all railroad employees on the railroads today will have nothing to fear.

These railroad dictators—and by that I mean the banking interests which control the railroads—have subverted the use of the railroads and perverted their use from that of mainly and primarily serving the public, and through their interlocking directorates have caused the railroads to operate for the benefit of the steel industry, the cement industry, and other industries which they have controlled; selling rails to the railroads for as high as $53 a ton—rails of the same character as Andrew Carnegie made his millions selling at $22 a ton—though last fall, under pressure of the executive department, they very graciously and patriotically reduced that price to $37 a ton. An old partner of Andrew Carnegie told me they could still sell the rails to the railroads for $22 a ton and make a good profit. The Federal Trade Commission, in their investigation of the cement industry, a by-product of steel, showed that by their various so-called "base rate-making schemes" they had gouged out of the American public more than $30,000,000 in the matter of cement alone.

In all these industries they have fought the organizations of labor who have tried to raise the standard of living for the workmen, and they have always fought any increases in wages. They are never satisfied with their share of the national income collected in the country. They take advantage of reduced wages and high freight rates to collect from a helpless people who have apparently no protection from the Government, and when they cannot gouge enough out of the public through high freight rates they go to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation—to collect for the benefit of the railroads? No; to collect for the benefit of those who hold the control of their interests. As a result we have the country in its present condition.

It is time we change some of these policies and change the influences that control these industries—not only railroads and transportation but manufacturing as well.

We have suffered from 1920 up until the present time. For the benefit of Senators who were not here when I began my remarks, may I repeat, the census shows that we have lost enough population to reduce the membership in the lower House by 17 Members. The farmers of the country have been slipping economically since 1920. When they were bankrupted and exhausted, the rest of the country was bankrupted and exhausted, too. That part of the country, in my opinion, must be restored to a basis of equality with other parts of the country and must be revived, because it is the foundation of the Nation, the backbone of the Nation, the bread basket of the Nation. It must be restored if we are going to start back on the road to permanent restoration of prosperity. The ratification of this treaty will be a step in that direction.

STUDIES OF THE GREAT LAKES-ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

During the delivery of Mr. SHIPSTEAD's speech,

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, there is on the desk a message from the President relative to the pending matter, which I desire to have laid before the Senate. The message is very short, consisting of only a few lines, and I should like to have it laid before the Senate so that the report accompanying it may be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mrs. CARAWAY in the chair). The Chair lays before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which will be read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

To the Senate:

I transmit herewith for the information of the Senate reports prepared in the War Department as to the engineering and economic advisability of the proposed Great Lakes-St. Lawrence improvement.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 19, 1934.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, the information referred to in the reports accompanying the President's message will be of great value to the Senate in the consideration of the pending question. So I ask unanimous consent that the report of November 25, 1933, and also the report of the economic study by the Board of Engineers of the War Department, which reports are transmitted with the message of the President, may, with the illustrations, be printed for the use of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. The message and accompanying documents will lie on the table.

AGREEMENTS UNDER AGRICULTURAL ADJUSTMENT ACT

After the conclusion of Mr. SHIPSTEAD's speech and as in legislative session,

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, as in legislative session I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. 2284) relating to contracts and agreements under the Agricultural Adjustment Act. I believe it will not lead to any discussion. It is simply to suspend those statutes which prohibit a Representative or Senator from entering into a contract with the Government even in relation to the acreage-reduction program that is now in progress. There are Representatives and Senators who are wheat farmers and cotton farmers, but they cannot enter into the acreage-reduction agreements without making themselves liable to those statutes to which I have referred. I ask unanimous consent for immediate consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MURPHY in the chair). Is there objection to the request of the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, before unanimous consent is granted I hope the Senator will have the bill reported.

Mr. SMITH. Yes; I ask to have it read for the information of Senators.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, is this a request for unanimous consent to proceed to consideration of the bill?

Mr. SMITH. Yes; to proceed to its consideration when it shall have been read. The committee reported it unanimously. It is to relieve Representatives and Senators from the operation of the laws which forbid them to enter into any contract whatsoever with the Government. It simply applies to the Crop Adjustment Act. Let us have it read, and then the Senator will understand it.

Mr. McNARY. I believe that I understand it now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Let the bill be read.

The Chief Clerk read the bill (S.Res. 2284), as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the provisions of section 3741 of the Revised Statutes (U.S.C., title 41, sec. 22) and sections 114 and 115 of the Criminal Code of the United States (U.S.C., title 18, secs. 204 and 205) shall not apply to any contracts or agreements heretofore or hereafter entered into under the Agricultural Adjustment Act.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, while I am a member of the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and have been for a number of years, having preceded the able Senator from South Carolina as its chairman, I was not present at the meeting when this bill was considered. This is the first I have heard of the legislation. It is an important matter. No one has heard anything about it. We have been studying other and more important measures. I certainly would not grant unanimous consent to take it up at this time.

Mr. SMITH. May I explain to the Senator just what happened last year? We enacted a law providing for a reduction of crop acreage. The Government was to enter into certain contracts in that connection. In good faith, we passed the bill and entered into the contracts. Then we were notified that some of us who had participated in the passage of the bill, some of us who are wheat farmers or cotton farmers or otherwise, could not legally enter into such contracts with the Government.

What kind of a condition were we in? Here we were advocating that other people do what the law said we, as Members of Congress could not do. People were driving up and down to my place and all over South Carolina asking, "What is Senator SMITH going to do? Is he going to plow up his cotton or is he going to reduce his acreage?" This bill is simply to exempt Congressmen and Senators from the operation of the Agricultural Adjustment Act insofar as it applies to acreage reduction.

May I say to the Senator that action of this kind was so obviously necessary, if we were going to go on with acreage reduction, that there was not a single vote against the measure in committee; and I think the Senator from Oregon was about the only one who was absent.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, inasmuch as this measure affects Senators and Congressmen, I think we should proceed with unusual caution. For that reason I object to its present consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

ALCOHOLIC-BEVERAGE REGULATION IN THE DISTRICT—CONFERENCE REPORT

As in legislative session,

Mr. KING submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 6181) to control the manufacture, transportation, possession, and sale of alcoholic beverages in the District of Columbia, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 5, 6, 18, 53, 54, 63, and 64.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 4, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 38, 39, 41, 42, 43, 45, 46, 47, 49, 51, 52, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 65, 66, and 67, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 3: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 3, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the Senate amendment insert "the product of the normal alcoholic fermentation of the juice of fresh, sound, ripe grapes, with the usual cellar treatment and necessary additions to correct defects due to climatic, saccharine and seasonal conditions, including champagne, sparkling, artificially carbonated and fortified wine. No other product obtained by the fermentation of the natural sugar contents of fruits or other agricultural products containing sugar shall be called 'wine' unless designated by appropriate prefix descriptions of the fruit or other product from which the same was predominantly produced, or as artificial or imitation wine"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 19: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 19, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the Senate amendment insert "but the Commissioners shall not authorize the sale by any licensee, other than the holder of a retailer's license, class E, of any beverages on Sundays, other than light wines and beer, and any such sale is hereby prohibited"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 28: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 28, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the Senate amendment insert "or light wines"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 37: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 37, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On page 6 of the Senate engrossed amendments, line 5, strike out "a retailer's license" and insert "retailer's licenses"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 40: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 40, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the Senate amendment insert "not, within 5 years prior to the filing of such application, been convicted of a misdemeanor under the National Prohibition Act, as amended and supplemented, or, within 10 years prior to such filing, been convicted of any felony"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 44: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 44, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the Senate amendment insert "who has, within 5 years prior thereto, been convicted of a misdemeanor under the National Prohibition Act, as amended and supplemented, or, within 10 years prior thereto, been convicted of any felony"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 48: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 48, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the Senate amendment insert "or tax-free wines"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 50: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 50, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the Senate amendment insert "who has, within 5 years prior thereto, been convicted of a misdemeanor under the National Prohibition Act, as amended and supplemented, or, within 10 years prior thereto, been convicted of any felony"; and the Senate agree to the same.

WILLIAM H. KING,
ROBT. R. REYNOLDS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

MARY T. NORTON,
GALE H. STALKER,
VINCENT L. PALMISANO,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was agreed to.

GREAT LAKES-ST. LAWRENCE DEEP WATERWAY TREATY

The Senate, in executive session and as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the treaty between the United States and the Dominion of Canada for the completion of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence deep waterway, signed July 18, 1932.

Mr. DUFFY obtained the floor.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for the purpose of suggesting the absence of a quorum?

Mr. DUFFY. I yield.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Barbour	Brown	Capper
Ashurst	Barkley	Bulkley	Caraway
Austin	Black	Bulow	Carey
Bachman	Bone	Byrd	Clark
Bankhead	Borah	Byrnes	Connally
Coolidge	Gore	McNary	Smith
Copeland	Hale	Murphy	Steiwer
Costigan	Harrison	Neely	Stephens
Couzens	Hastings	Norris	Thomas, Okla.
Cutting	Hatch	Nye	Thomas, Utah
Davis	Hayden	O'Mahoney	Thompson
Dickinson	Johnson	Overton	Townsend
Dieterich	Kean	Patterson	Trammell
Dill	Keyes	Pittman	Tydings
Duffy	King	Pope	Vandenberg
Erickson	La Follette	Reed	Van Nuys
Fess	Lewis	Reynolds	Wagner
Fletcher	Logan	Robinson, Ark.	Walcott
Frazier	Lonergan	Robinson, Ind.	Walsh
George	McAdoo	Russell	Wheeler
Gibson	McCarran	Schall	White
Glass	McGill	Sheppard
Goldsborough	McKellar	Shipstead

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to announce that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY] and the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] are necessarily detained from the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Ninety Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. DUFFY. Mr. President, strange as the request may sound, I am today going to make a plea for fair play, in the consideration that this body will give to the St. Lawrence Seaway Treaty.

There, of course, is some opposition to this treaty based upon broad national grounds; but I regret to say that, in the discussion in this body, there has been very evident, a considerable opposition that can in no wise be given that designation.

As a new Senator, during the special session I confess that I was amazed and surprised at the tactics and maneuverings that this most important question received. One of the first things I discovered was that a filibuster was going on to get over the morning hour on the question pertaining to the so-called "New York power agreement." It was, of course, linked up with the seaway treaty, and various devices were used that were apparently designed, not to present the question for open and fair discussion and action by this body, but to delay, from time to time, a fair vote or consideration upon it.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. DUFFY. Yes; I yield.

Mr. CLARK. Since the Senator has made some reference to the question of taking a vote on the power agreement between the United States and the State of New York in the last session, the Senator will be fair enough to say that when a vote was taken on that proposition in an amendment to the National Recovery Act, in spite of the fact that no Senator occupied even one moment of time in opposition to the proposal, and that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] occupied a considerable time in support of the measure, on a roll-call vote in this body it was defeated by more than 4 to 1.

Mr. DUFFY. I agree that that was the result with the amendment to that particular bill. I felt at the time that that was not a proper place for the question to be submitted to this body in connection with that legislation; but it was the only opportunity that the senior Senator from Wisconsin had under the circumstances. There was no advance knowledge of the matter by a great many of the Senators. The point I am commenting on, however, is that all the devices and all the maneuverings were used to prevent reference to a committee that had had long hearings upon the treaty proper; and it was quite apparent, at least to me, unschooled as I was and still am in the way those things are handled, that various devices have been used from time to time to prevent its coming up on its own merits for consideration by this body.

The President, in his message to this body just the other day, said what I think should be repeated for the benefit of people who have apparently been misled throughout the country:

> It is, I believe, a historic fact that every great improvement directed to better commercial communications, whether in the case of railroads into new territory, or the deepening of great rivers, or the building of canals, or even the cutting of the Isthmus of Panama, have all been subjected to opposition on the part of local interests which conjure up imaginary fears and fail to realize that improved transportation results in increased commerce benefiting directly or indirectly all sections.

The appeal I desire to make is that this treaty should be considered, as the President himself requests, not from a narrow, selfish viewpoint, but from a broad national viewpoint of trying to determine what will bring the greatest good to the greatest number of our people. President Roosevelt in his message said that from the broad national point of view the construction of this seaway will greatly benefit commerce and transportation, but a point that should be emphasized is that local fears of economic harm to special localities or to special interests are grossly exaggerated.

Mr. President, surely the people of this Nation have at this time the greatest confidence in our President. They not only admire his wisdom and his courage but more than that, they idolize him and feel great confidence in the frankness and the candor with which he has taken the people into his confidence with reference to questions which confront the Government.

Let our people not be misled by the propaganda which has been so widely spread, but pay heed to the President's statement that exaggerated fears have been conjured up to try to prevent a ratification of the pending treaty.

In my humble opinion, there is no question but that sectional prejudices and selfish interests and ungrounded fears are the backbone of the opposition at this time. We even hear the opposition privately expressed, perhaps in the cloakrooms and in other places, because of some fancied, at least temporary, disadvantage to some small section of the country. But the American people, I think, will demand that this treaty be considered by this body from a broad, national viewpoint, and I believe that they will insist that the President's request on this point be carried out.

Mr. President, it does seem to me somewhat peculiar that the opponents of this treaty spend much time and effort in trying to convince the people, and Members of this body, that the construction of the proposed seaway would be a waste of money, that it would be of no great value to the country as a whole. They say that in one breath, and then in the next breath they voice their opposition because they contend that the completion of the seaway will do harm to their sections of the country.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DUFFY. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. I think the Senator will very readily understand that it is entirely consistent for a Senator from the middle or lower Mississippi Valley to think that the consummation of this treaty, with its limitation on the diversion of water from Lake Michigan, might do inestimable harm to the section of the country from which he comes, irrespective of what his opinion might be as to utility of the seaway as a whole. In other words, a man might believe either that the seaway would be of great advantage to the States profiting by it, or he might honestly believe it would be of no advantage to anybody, and at the same time he might see very clearly the disadvantage to the States of the middle and lower Mississippi Valley and the States of the great Middle West, because of this Government's granting away the right of diverting water from Lake Michigan to the detriment of the Lakes-to-the-Gulf project, which would be of inestimable harm to those States.

Mr. DUFFY. I recollect the opening statement of the Senator from Missouri, to the effect that the treaty itself might prevent people from supporting the seaway who might be in favor of it as a general proposition; but it does seem very apparent that no possible treaty can be put into effect that will suit everybody, that will not perhaps bring some injustice or unfairness, for the time being, perhaps, or even for a longer period of time, to certain sections. My appeal is based on the fact that the people of the land-locked Middle West for years and years have uncomplainingly supported and contributed by their taxes for the deepening of New York Harbor; toward making Philadelphia a seaport, although some distance from the sea; willingly bore their part of the burden of 35 or 40 million dollars of expenditure to make New Orleans a seaport, although 110 miles from the sea. All thise things, even the building of the Panama Canal, affected them, from a selfish viewpoint, adversely, and yet, from a broad, national viewpoint, I contend that when a project is before this body for consideration there should be a broader viewpoint taken, and that a question should be resolved down to this, What will be the greatest good for the greatest number?

I do not question those who honestly believe that ratification of the treaty providing for this seaway would not be for the best interests of the greatest number. It is their duty, I take it, to oppose such a proposition if they think that way; but it does seem to me that almost every evidence of opposition there has been from so many sources seems to be based almost entirely upon a consideration of what the effect might be to some small portion of the country, without consideration of what would be the greatest good for the greatest number.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. DUFFY. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. I think it is essentially unfair for the Senator from Wisconsin to undertake to talk about sectionalism in opposition to this treaty. The Senator from Wisconsin, of course, is motivated himself by sectionalism because his State lies on this proposed seaway. Certainly the Senator does not mean to accuse somebody else of sectionalism when this treaty not only provides for the seaway but goes further and would result in the prevention of the diversion of water from Lake Michigan which should go into the Lakes-to-the-Gulf project.

Mr. DUFFY. The State of Wisconsin also borders on the Mississippi River. But I think our duty is to try to look beyond State lines, to try to consider the proposition as a whole, and to try to have in mind the area which will be affected, beneficially or adversely. It seems to me that if that is done, a very large measure of the opposition which has been engendered against this treaty will be put aside.

There can be no question, Mr. President, but that since the war there has been a tremendous increase in rail freight rates, and it does seem to me that we should consider this matter without regard to the argument which we have heard here—and I do not intend to go into it in detail—as to how much a bushel a farmer from the land-locked Middle West might save in his transportation costs. There is no question but that the prices of many agricultural products are fixed upon the basis of the world market price, and what the farmer receives is that price less the cost of transportation. I think there is no question but that water transportation is and always has resulted in a great saving over rail transportation.

All human history is a story of the seas. There is no question but that those nations which have had the advantage of water transportation have been in a preferred situation. There is no question, of course, as to the great value that was and is to Great Britain. She can build up great manufactures where there are none of the raw products—for instance, steel or cotton—found in her own land. There can be no question but that ship transportation is beneficial to any portion of any country.

It seems to me that that can be well shown by a consideration of the question that was asked the other day: If this is going to be of such great benefit to the Middle West, why has there not been a greater use of the facilities via the St. Lawrence River which now exist?

In the upper part of the Great Lakes system we can ship in large ships. There are what are called the "upper lakers" and the "lower lakers." The "lower lakers" must be necessarily of much smaller capacity, and it is the capacity and the draft of a ship which, in a large measure, controls the question of the price, because the cost per ton-mile of the lower laker, as I understand it, is almost four times as great as the cost per ton-mile of the upper laker, and it would be the upper laker, or that kind of a ship, that would be able to use the St. Lawrence seaway if it were constructed as is proposed under the present plan.

I say, therefore, Mr. President, that the people of the Middle West have patiently year after year borne their share of the cost of improving the facilities for water transportation in other parts of the country. On their part, they have never adopted a selfish attitude regarding a project because it would help someone else and might adversely affect them. It seems to me that where a considerable portion of the country will be benefited, the prosperity and the profits which will come thereafter are bound to redound, to a certain degree, to the whole country.

It does seem to me that the propaganda we have heard about the cost of this undertaking is a matter which should have some consideration. We who practice law know that expert witnesses are a rather peculiar quantity. So often, unfortunately, in various kinds of lawsuits we find that the expert testimony seems to be governed entirely by those who are paying the fees for attendance in court.

It seems to me that the junior Senator from Michigan has demonstrated conclusively that the estimates of the Engineering Corps of the United States Army, from the experience that they have had in the past of similar kinds of projects, should be relied upon, and that their testimony is the testimony that we have the right to rely upon, and should rely upon here. They are impartial; they have no ax to grind; they are not serving under any retainer by anyone who is interested; they have given their estimates, and I think the people of the country should realize that those are the estimates as to cost that they should consider; and if, as has been stated and estimated, there will be a net cost to the United States of some $169,000,000, deducting the amount that the Power Authority of New York will pay, surely the expenditures of $21,000,000 a year for 8 years is not what is causing all the opposition or the consternation that has been evidenced in the discussion of this question. It does seem to me that we have a right to rely completely upon the estimate of the Army engineers.

I heard also the learned senior Senator from Illinois the other day suggest that because the power question was involved here, it had been brought in in some rather mysterious way, perhaps, to aid in the ratification of this treaty. It does seem to me, Mr. President, that the very fact that the power question is involved here perhaps accounts for some of the viciousness of the opposition that we see in various parts of the country. We cannot, I suppose, blame those who have power to sell and who have for years been getting exorbitant rates, and have charged unconscionably for the power, for objecting to any great project that will bring cheaper power to the people of this country; that is their selfish viewpoint, but I think our consideration should be that of trying, if possible, to take the viewpoint of the people who have to pay for the power rather than the viewpoint of those who have in a series of long periods of propaganda tried to mold public opinion in their favor on one hand, while with the other hand it seemed to me they were actually robbing the public by reason of the high rates they charged. I need not go into all the ways the holding companies were built upon each other, and the inflated valuation that took place. Those folks selfishly have a right to vigorously oppose this project. It seems to me that there would not be as much opposition to the ratification of the treaty had it not been for the fact that there is the question of power involved.

There is one thing, however, that I have not heard mentioned here, and it seems to me that we should consider it; that is, that if there is to be a power development in the International Rapids section it must be by treaty. As I understand from an engineering standpoint, if you are going to have a power development you must have a dam that reaches from river bank to river bank; and therefore it would be impossible to construct a power development without a treaty, an international agreement with Canada.

On the other hand, Mr. President, should Canada desire to construct a lock on her side of the river in the International Rapids section, not having anything to do with the power at all, but merely with the question of navigation, there is nothing whatsoever to prevent her from doing so. She can do it without our authority or without asking the United States anything about it; and should she do that, what would there be to prevent Canada from charging an unreasonably large amount of toll for ships that do not fly the British flag, or what could we do to prevent discrimination against our own shipping?

It seems to me that another point which we ought to consider briefly is the fact—in view of the comments of the senior Senator from Illinois about it being a gateway for a foreign foe—that the plans and specifications differ materially from those of the Suez Canal and from those of the Panama Canal in this, that with the amount of depth it is absolutely unsuited for men-of-war and could not be used by the largest of ocean liners. Referring to the fear that was expressed here, it seems to me that taking into consideration the depth that is proposed, it shows that perhaps that depth was limited designedly—at least it so happens that were it constructed along the present lines there would be no danger or possibility of men-of-war steaming up through the St. Lawrence into the Great Lakes.

I think also that those on this side of the house, while it is not at all a partisan question, should not too lightly throw over their shoulders, if you please, that the pledge was made to the people by the Democratic national platform that we were in favor with the construction of this seaway.

It can be argued now that perhaps it was not contemplated that this or that particular provision would be in the treaty.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. DUFFY. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. I should like to ask the junior Senator from Wisconsin whether at the time of the Democratic National Convention and at the time of the Republican National Convention—at the time when there were inserted in the two national platforms planks favoring, in general terms, the seaway—the treaty had been promulgated, or the terms thereof had been made public, or whether anybody in either convention had information as to the limitation of diversion of water from Lake Michigan?

Mr. DUFFY. I was just going to say on that very point, when the Senator interrupted, that while it is true that the particular provisions of the treaty were not known in exact terms, yet this seems to be the only opportunity that we will have to carry out the pledge that we did make to the American people. There is not any question due to the fact that the particular plank was not read by the chairman of the resolutions committee. I have heard one or two of the Senators privately express themselves as though that is of some moment. As I understand it, however, the chairman of the resolutions committee has, by affidavit, stated that it was in the platform; that he intended to read it, and that it was only by inadvertence that it was not read. Nevertheless, we now have the opportunity to carry out that pledge, and while, as I said before, no treaty can ever be framed, I suppose, to carry out the pledges on a general proposition that will meet approval everywhere—and it can always be used as an excuse, perhaps, for not carrying out the general principle—yet I think in good faith the Members on this side of the House, as well as on the other, are committed to the general proposition, and it seems to me that this is the opportunity we have to carry out that pledge.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me once more to interrupt his speech?

Mr. DUFFY. Yes.

Mr. CLARK. I simply wish to make one statement. I am unable to see how any Senator on this side of the Chamber can be bound by a pledge in a party platform which, according to the Senator's own admission, was never read to the convention, never adopted by the convention, and which, if it had been read, in the light of the limitation of the diversion of water from Lake Michigan and in the light of the subsidy for relieving the Canadian treasury by the use of American money to employ Canadian labor and purchase Canadian materials, certainly would not have been adopted at the Democratic National Convention without a very bitter fight. I am unable to see any such pledge.

Mr. DUFFY. The candidate on the Democratic ticket—when the circumstances were brought to light that by inadvertence, after it had been passed by the subcommittee and was supposed to have been read, it was not read—by a statement to the people of this Nation over the radio made the pledge again. He considered that this plank was a part of the Democratic national platform, and he added to that that he personally approved that plank 100 percent. It does seem to me that in all good faith that pledge is binding upon those on this side of the aisle.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. DUFFY. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The partisan question, Mr. President, is not of much importance; but I should like to testify that in the course of the campaign the late Senator from Montana, Mr. Walsh, came into our area and into the Northwest, and gave the electorate the assurance that the Democratic allegiance to the treaty, which was then in existence and then pending, would be entirely dependable. I undertook to argue on the hustings, as the Senator from Missouri now argues, that it was not dependable, but the people seemed to believe the Senator from Montana instead of me, and in large measure they committed their spokesmanship to the Democracy—whether or not because of Senator Walsh's assurance I do not know; but at any rate they did it in the face of this assurance.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin permit one further question?

Mr. DUFFY. Yes.

Mr. CLARK. My only reason for injection of remarks on this subject arose from the fact that the Senator from Wisconsin is trying to appeal to the conscience of individual Senators on this side of the aisle to vote for a pledge which was not in the platform; and whatever the Senator from Montana, the late Senator Walsh, may have said during the campaign, whatever the President of the United States may have said during the campaign, was not binding on individual Senators who were themselves running on that platform.

I may say that so far as I was concerned—so far from being bound by the statements of the Senator from Montana, or so far from being bound by the statements of the President of the United States—when it began to be published in the newspapers that this treaty would create a limitation of diversion of water from Lake Michigan, I announced publicly during the course of the campaign, that I would oppose it if I were elected United States Senator.

Mr. DUFFY. Of course, Mr. President, the objection as to the diversion of water and the various other objections that are raised have to disregard and apparently do disregard the estimate made by the Engineer Corps of the War Department. As I said before, I think, so far as this case is concerned, they appear to be the most disinterested witnesses. They have no reason in any way to color their findings, and certainly, based on the instances so ably brought out here by the junior Senator from Michigan during the last several days, and also from past experience, we have a right to believe that their estimates are very accurate; indeed, on the basis of 1926 costs in this case, they would seem to me to be very conservative. I will refer again to the comment the Senator from Michigan made as to a project in the Detroit River, or somewhere in that vicinity, where construction work was being carried on, to the effect that, based on 1926 costs, there was a tremendous saving from the estimated costs.

Mr. President, I have discussed this question as long as I had intended. I merely want once more to appeal to the spirit of fair play toward that great area in the land-locked Middle West. The Great Lakes handle, as I remember the figures, some 90 percent of the total water-borne ton-mileage of the country and receive only 11 percent of the funds for port and channel improvements appropriated by the Federal Government. Our people, it seems to me, have patiently borne the adverse competition that comes from water development in other sections of the country. We have borne it because we thought it was the part of good citizenship to do so. We thought it was fundamental that when any portion of the country is benefited by a given undertaking it is bound to help the country as a whole. We plead at this time, when the opportunity is at hand, at least to equalize some of the disadvantages that have come to us in that section, and ask that the question be considered from a broad, national viewpoint, and that the smaller selfish viewpoint be submerged in the effort to determine what will do the greatest good for the greatest number.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I am of the opinion that one of the fundamental things for the American people to consider in connection with the St. Lawrence development project is not only the amount of money that the American Government will be called upon to expend, but in addition thereto I think the people should interest themselves in the question of how much of the money that the taxpayers of the country will be required to pay will be expended in the United States and how much of it is going to be sent into the Dominion of Canada to be expended there. At this critical period in the history of the Nation I believe all will agree that it will be better for the people of this country to expend within the confines of the United States every cent that can legitimately and properly be expended here. I am of the opinion that this is not any time for us to expend money, particularly unnecessarily, in any foreign territory or lend any money to any other country.

This project strikes me as one which, of course, would be cordially acclaimed by the people of Canada, because they are the ones who are going to benefit as the result of the ratification of this treaty if it shall be ratified. I have, therefore, made a few memoranda with regard to this subject which I should like to submit to this honorable body.

Mr. President, the question is, Can we afford it? The answer to this is to appraise the cost. The first and lowest estimate is that of the Joint Board of Engineers, which estimates the cost at $543,429,000, of which the United States would pay $272,453,000. Experience tells us, however, that preliminary engineering estimates are generally too low. The Panama Canal was estimated to cost $160,000,000, and did actually cost $533,000,000; the Suez Canal was estimated at $30,000,000, and did cost $80,000,000.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REYNOLDS. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I know the Senator's desire for accuracy. In connection with the Panama Canal, when the drawings were completed, as they are completed in respect to the pending project, the engineers' estimate was $375,000,000, as I recall, and the canal was built for $3,000,000 less than the estimate.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Apparently the Senator's figures and mine do not agree. The Welland Canal was estimated at $50,000,000 and actually cost $128,000,000; the Chicago Drainage Canal was estimated to cost $16,000,000 and did cost $53,000,000; the New York State Barge Canal was estimated to cost $62,000,000 and did cost actually $176,000,000. The probability, therefore, is that the St. Lawrence project will cost us at least twice what the engineers figure. Thus, other engineering estimates have placed the probable cost as follows:

Hugh L. Cooper, international engineer	$1,350,000,000
E. P. Goodrich, consulting engineer	1,054,000,000
Brookings Institution	900,000,000

This is the outlay proposed in the face of existing conditions and of a Government economy program.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me again?

Mr. REYNOLDS. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I dislike to interrupt the Senator, but I have placed in the RECORD a telegram from Colonel Cooper showing that the figures which the Senator now reads apply to a totally different project, one three times as big as the pending project. Therefore, obviously his figures are three times greater than the figures of the United States War Department engineers. I submit to the Senator, in fairness, that Colonel Cooper's estimate should no longer be quoted against the validity of the engineers' estimate upon this particular St. Lawrence project. I am sure the Senator did not know that I had presented Colonel Cooper's telegram.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I hope I may be pardoned for interrupting both Senators, but here I beg to interject that my honorable friend from Michigan is in error. He is, first, in error in his premises; the telegram of Colonel Cooper does not carry out the conclusion of my eminent friend from Michigan; and, second, he is wrong in his conclusion. I do not attach much importance to Colonel Cooper as a finality, but when my eminent friend, in connection with Colonel Cooper's estimate, suggests that he applies his figures to a different form of construction, and to something that does not exist and is directly opposed to what is now before the Senate, I will say the Senator from Michigan is wholly wrong and in error.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Carolina yield to me again?

Mr. REYNOLDS. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I think it is quite important that we should find out what Colonel Cooper did say. I ask the Senator from Illinois if Colonel Cooper did not state upon Monday that he was estimating upon the production of 6,000,000 horsepower of electricity instead of the production of 2,000,000 horsepower? What is the answer to that?

Mr. LEWIS. Has the Senator concluded his query?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Yes.

Mr. LEWIS. The pending treaty suggests 5,000,000 horsepower, does it not?

Mr. VANDENBERG. It does not.

Mr. LEWIS. Does it not provide for 5,000,000 horsepower?

Mr. VANDENBERG. It does not; it provides for 2,100,000 horsepower. That is the project estimated upon by the engineers.

Mr. LEWIS. I again ask the Senator, Does it not provide contingently for 5,000,000 if necessary?

Mr. VANDENBERG. It does not in the international section.

Mr. LEWIS. We are not discussing the question of varying kinds of sections. We are talking about the whole project as a project.

Mr. VANDENBERG. We are discussing the international section and nothing else.

Mr. LEWIS. We are now discussing the project as a whole.

Mr. VANDENBERG. We are discussing the project that is pending. The only pending project is for a power development in the international section, and that is the only thing to which the consent of the Senate is sought.

Mr. LEWIS. My able friend finds himself in a situation where his mind is driven to confusion.

Mr. VANDENBERG. My mind is driven back to the project.

Mr. LEWIS. My friend is wrong in his suggestion. The power feature is provided in double form; one as it is defined, and the other as such development is possible and permissible, and the Board of Engineers agreed even to extend that.

Now I answer about Colonel Cooper's telegram. I repeat, I attach little importance—and I offer my apology to the Senator from North Carolina for interrupting him—to Colonel Cooper's telegram in reply to the honorable Senator from Michigan. When the Senator from Michigan made inquiry as to why the estimate of Colonel Cooper was made and on the basis, Colonel Cooper wrote the telegram to the able Senator from Michigan in which he set forth the basis on which he then figured, resulting in the very full extra sum, as stated, but there is nothing in the telegram of Colonel Cooper to show that the estimate he made as to the canal and its expense as projected and put before the committee, on which the able Senator from Michigan and myself sat, has been changed in any wise whatsoever. So the Senator from North Carolina is absolutely correct in his premises.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I beg pardon of the Senator from North Carolina for one further rejoinder. There is nothing in the record, I must reassert, which justifies any construction the Senator from Illinois submits to the Senate. The pending estimates of the War Department are based upon a development of 2,100,000 horsepower. Colonel Cooper's own statement is that his estimate is based upon 6,600,000 horsepower; and if it does not cost more to construct a project for 6,000,000 horsepower than one for 2,000,000 horsepower, then the Senator from Illinois is a Republican and I am a Democrat. [Laughter in the galleries.]

Mr. LEWIS. I did not get the last reply of the Senator, by which he smothered the intelligence of the galleries in amusement. Will he repeat it so that I may get its import, if it has any?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I think the controversy is concluded.

Mr. LEWIS. Naturally the Senator would avoid any further controversy in a matter such as this; that, of course, would be the salvation of his contention; but, so far as I am concerned, it is not concluded unless it is concluded right, and when concluded by my eminent friend from Michigan it is concluded wrong.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, if I may now resume, let me ask, Do we need this waterway? Its proponents estimate the maximum capacity of the waterway at 25,000,000 tons a year. A careful survey made a few years ago indicated that possible available tonnage, under conditions prevailing at that time, would not exceed 10,500,000 tons, of which 5,500,000 would come from the United States, and 5,000,000 from Canada. Sixty percent of the tonnage was expected to be grain. The estimated exports, however, of grain from the United States were put at 2,062,000 tons, and from Canada at 4,300,000 tons. All of the United States exports were estimated at 2,600,000 tons, and Canadian exports at 4,522,000 tons. Thus the proposed project, on the basis of the two Governments sharing the burden of the expenses equally, would serve almost double the amount of Canadian exports as compared with those from the United States.

The advocates of this waterway project have claimed a saving of 6 cents a bushel on wheat, but evidence shows that wheat has been and is being hauled from the head of the Lakes for a charge of 4½ cents a bushel and less. Obviously, 6 cents cannot be saved out of this. No one questions the fact that there is no need for this additional transportation service, which can operate only from 6½ to 7 months in the year, for the reason that adequate and efficient transportation facilities already exist to handle the traffic offered or that will be offered in the foreseeable future. The construction of this waterway would mean additional, subsidized, and unneeded transportation service and, if successful, will only divert traffic from essential transportation facilities without savings in total cost.

Ninety percent of the St. Lawrence River lies wholly within the Dominion of Canada.

Ninety percent of the grain that might be exported through the St. Lawrence would be Canadian grain.

Ninety-eight percent of the ocean-going ships that would transport grain would be foreign bottomed. United States ships must operate under the provisions of the Seaman's Act of 1916, which provides for more space on shipboard for each seaman, and a higher wage. Foreign vessels, with lower wage rates and smaller accommodations, would be brought in to compete with American labor under unfair conditions.

Eighty percent of the water power capable of development would be in the Dominion of Canada. More than 3,000,000 of the 5,000,000 horsepower which could be harnessed would be Canadian.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Carolina indulge me for a further interruption?

Mr. REYNOLDS. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS. I request the attention of my eminent friend the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG]. I call his attention to the Canadian estimate as read from the editorial which was introduced from the administration paper of Canada, the Mail and Empire, of Toronto, and I read to the able Senator the figures I asserted a moment ago as the contention as well as the hope:

> The treaty has its power side as well as its navigation side. The work in the international section and in the national section will develop about 5,000,000 horsepower—

My able friend said I was wrong in those figures—

> Of this, 2,000,000 horsepower will be available in the international section and 3,000,000 in the national section. Canada, that is to say, the Province of Ontario, is to obtain 1,000,000 of the 2,000,000 horsepower to be produced in the international section, but all of the 3,000,000 horsepower to be developed in the national section, which is wholly in Quebec, will belong to this country. This means that Canada is to obtain 4,000,000 horsepower and the United States 1,000,000 horsepower out of the whole St. Lawrence waterway development.

Upon that basis I am sure my eminent friend and myself will concede that Canada is getting the great majority of the horsepower under the treaty.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Carolina yield for a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. REYNOLDS. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Of course, what the Senator is now discussing is wholly beside the point of our original controversy. There is no argument in the world that there is a great deal of additional power to be developed under Canadian auspices upon the Canadian side of the river. That is precisely the thing Colonel Cooper indicates in his telegram as the basis of his estimate.

The controversy between the Senator and myself related solely to this question, and I invite the Senator's attention to the statement in the editorial which he has just read, namely, that there is 2,000,000 horsepower to be developed in the international section. The engineers' estimate on the part of the War Department of the United States is based solely upon the 2,000,000-horsepower development in the international section. Colonel Cooper's estimate is based not only upon the 2,000,000 horsepower to be developed in the international section, but also upon an additional 4,000,000 horsepower not contained in the pending project, not involving the United States, all to be developed some day by Canada, all in Canadian waters, all under Canadian auspices. Therefore, the two estimates, I submit, are upon different propositions, as Colonel Cooper himself stated, and it is not fair to state that the estimate of the engineers is wrong because it does not equal an estimate upon a much broader and more expanded project. It seems to me the Senator and I ought to be in agreement upon these fundamental facts.

Mr. LEWIS. It is impossible for me to agree, because they are facts which are not fundamental.

Mr. VANDENBERG. In what respect?

Mr. LEWIS. The treaty not only authorizes water power to the full figure I have stated, but places the expense of it upon the United States.

Mr. VANDENBERG. But that is not the question. The question is, What is the estimate?

Mr. LEWIS. I think the question is whether the estimate can be relied upon. Therefore, it cannot be, and that closes the discussion.

Mr. VANDENBERG. If the Senator is prepared to rest upon that record, I am, too.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Carolina yield to me?

Mr. REYNOLDS. Certainly.

Mr. BONE. I admit a little confusion in this discussion about the development of water power. I heard the very able Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] refer to a possible development of 3,000,000 horsepower in Canada that has no connection whatever with the power to be developed in the international section of the river. Is it assumed as a part of the argument that that 3,000,000 horsepower wholly in Canada is to be developed and charged against this entire development, or is it so much mere idle discussion? I heard a great deal of discussion and have heard for days much discussion about 3,000,000 horsepower in Canada. I want someone to enlighten me as to whether that is to be developed and charged to this whole river development, or whether that is something that may be developed in the future by Canada.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, there is probably no one better equipped to discuss the question of power and power development and the related questions of standards and prices than the able Senator from the State of Washington, who has made the question his great study and as to which he has been greatly confirmed by his people in sending him to the Senate. If he will take the time, because of his splendid capacity he is so superior to others in this body, to examine for himself what is testified and what has appeared in the RECORD, as well as the editorial, and then keep in mind the eminent Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], who is also one to be justly praised as highly equipped in this specialty, who called attention to this power and how it would extend and how it could be had, leading away up to far New England, he will be reminded that it is in Canada that this power is to be employed and paid for; and so I am compelled to say that under this treaty the whole of the development in both sections will be drawn from the moneys paid by the United States. I ask the able Senator from Washington please to investigate this record as to power that he may be equipped within himself to reach a conclusion upon which I should be glad to rest.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, if the Senator from North Carolina will indulge me in this little colloquy, it cost normally about $80 to $100 per installed horsepower to build a modern hydroelectric plant. Three million horsepower built in any river in this country or in Canada, including the St. Lawrence, probably would cost in that neighborhood.

I am going to do what the Senator from Illinois suggests—I am going to read that part of the treaty especially with care—but I am still unable to determine from the arguments of either the friends or the opponents of this treaty whether that 3,000,000 horsepower, built at a cost of around $80 per horsepower, is to be paid for by this country or by Canada under the terms of this treaty, or whether it is ever to be developed. It may never be developed. The treaty does not require it to be developed, as I understand.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, if the Senator from North Carolina will yield, the only horsepower cost that is involved, so far as the United States is concerned, is the cost of the power to be developed in the International Rapids section. By agreement already entered into between the engineers of the United States Army and the Power Authority of the State of New York, that cost is to be borne by the State of New York, and the installed horsepower investment will be, as I remember, around $81.75 per horsepower.

Mr. LEWIS. I thank the Senator from North Carolina. We must not interrupt him further.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, the total cost of the power development, with the construction of trunk-line transmission lines, rights-of-way, and so forth, would be so great, competent engineers declare, that the power thus developed could not compete with established power companies when the taxes the citizens will have to pay on the development are taken into consideration.

Sixty-two and two-thirds percent of the new money invested in this project would be United States money. Therefore, the project, which is 80 to 90 percent Canadian, would require 66⅔ percent of the new money to be paid by the United States. Article III, subdivision (b), provides that all work to be constructed—

> Within Canadian territory, or an equivalent proportion of the total works, shall, insofar as possible, be executed by Canadian engineers and Canadian labor and with Canadian material.

Under this provision of the treaty, American money will be expended for Canadian labor and materials and for the services of Canadian engineers, at the same time that our Government is trying so desperately to find employment for our citizens.

Article VIII of the treaty would make the United States surrender Lake Michigan and constitute it an international lake. Under the provisions of the treaty insufficient water diversion is allowed for the Chicago Drainage Canal and for the Mississippi River Channel.

For a large part of its way the St. Lawrence River runs wholly through foreign territory. This, therefore, does not represent a transportation facility under the control of the United States Government. It would most surely involve international complications in case of a war wherein the interests of the United States and Canada are not identical, as described by the able Senator from Illinois in his most interesting address several days ago on this subject.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REYNOLDS. I yield.

Mr. BONE. Again the Senator suggests something that makes me very curious.

Out in my section of the country there is a passage of water between the State of Washington and Alaska known as the "Inland Passage." It is hundreds of miles long, exclusively in Canadian territory. If vessels did not avail themselves of that passage, they would have to go out in the Pacific Ocean to reach Alaska. I ask the Senator whether the same condition would not apply to the use of that water that would apply to the use of the river he has just mentioned in the event that the right of free and untrammeled use of that river is reserved by treaty?

When we send vessels to Alaska now flying the American flag from ports on tidewater on Puget Sound, they traverse for hundreds of miles water that is purely Canadian, bordered on both sides by Canadian territory. I am wondering if the Senator can tell us whether or not the same condition will apply.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I think that is true; but at the same time, as we all know, certain complications relative to the use of that waterway would unquestionably arise. That is a matter to be considered here now, and I think is a most important matter.

The project would in no way give immediate relief to the present-day unemployment corresponding to that which the same amount of money spent within the United States would do. I believe, therefore, that United States money should be spent for United States projects wholly within the United States, and be used for the employment of United States labor, particularly at this time, Mr. President.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, may I be so bold as to ask the eminent Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG]—treating him as something of a guide and leader in this debate, and a protagonist of the treaty—whether there are some Senators who would like to address the Senate in behalf of the treaty today, or has the Senator the names and the times when others would like to address the Senate? We would not want to close this debate and rob them of the opportunity to be heard, any more than we would wish to have ours on this side deprived of the opportunity.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], of course, is in charge of the treaty and in charge of the debate. I will say to my friend from Illinois that I have no information respecting any speeches that are pending at the present time.

LEGISLATIVE SESSION

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I have been advised that there are other Senators who expect to speak, but they do not appear to be ready. I should like to have the Senate proceed to the consideration of legislative business for the purpose of bringing before the body Senate bill 2225, to provide for the establishment of a corporation to aid in the refinancing of farm debts, and for other purposes. It is not my intention to ask for action on the bill this afternoon.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, may I ask the distinguished Senator from Arkansas whether that is the bill which we discussed a few moments ago.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. It is.

Mr. McNARY. After it is made the unfinished business is it the purpose to proceed further today?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. It is my purpose to move a recess until Monday. The Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], who is in charge of the bill, is unable to be present this afternoon; and I am satisfied that the arrangement I have suggested will meet with his approval.

I move that the Senate resume the consideration of legislative business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Arkansas.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed legislative session.

REFINANCING OF FARM DEBTS

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 2225.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Arkansas.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2225) to provide for the establishment of a corporation to aid in the refinancing of farm debts, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Banking and Currency with amendments.

REFERENCE AND SIGNING OF BILLS

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I have before me an order which I should like to bring to the attention of the Senator from Oregon. I have had no opportunity of submitting it to him, but I am satisfied he will have no objection to it.

The order has two features. First, it permits the President of the Senate to sign the enrolled bill (H.R. 6181) to control the manufacture, transportation, possession, and sale of alcoholic beverages in the District of Columbia. Second, it permits the Secretary of the Senate to receive, and the President of the Senate to refer, bills which pass the House of Representatives.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, that conforms to the general practice, and I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The order will be read.

The order was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Ordered, That the President of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized to sign, after the adjournment or recess of the Senate today, the enrolled bill (H.R. 6181) to control the manufacture, transportation, possession, and sale of alcoholic beverages in the District of Columbia.

That, during the interim between the adjournment or recess of the Senate today and its next session, the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized to receive, and the President of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized to refer to the appropriate committee, any bill passed by the House of Representatives.

RECESS

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I move that the Senate stand in recess until 12 o'clock noon on Monday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Arkansas.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 3 o'clock and 31 minutes p.m.) the Senate took a recess until Monday, January 22, 1934, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

FRIDAY, JANUARY 19, 1934

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D.D., offered the following prayer:

To the living, loving, and eternal God we offer our tribute of praise. Impress us, our blessed Lord, that the devotion of a servant, the zeal of a prophet, and the love of an angel can be expressed in the humblest life. The equal eye of Thy glory knows neither great nor small, bond nor free. We pray that Thou wouldst shield us from ignoble ease, from the love of applause, and from the lust of appetite. In Thee may we find the strength and the aspiration to reach that high ideal that shall never mock us. Today let the stern precepts of duty be transfigured by the love we bear our country. In the name of Christ our Savior. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA LIQUOR BILL

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I present a conference report upon the bill (H.R. 6181) to control the manufacture, transportation, possession, and sale of alcoholic beverages in the District of Columbia and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentlewoman from New Jersey presents a conference report upon the District of Columbia liquor bill and asks unanimous consent for its present consideration. Is there objection?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, is not this a privileged report?

The SPEAKER. It takes unanimous consent to consider it at this time. Otherwise it would have to go over a day.

Mr. SNELL. I have no objection myself.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the conference report?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object in order to ask the gentlewoman a question. Does she propose to discuss the conference report?

Mrs. NORTON. If the House considers it is absolutely necessary to do so, yes; but I sincerely hope that it will not.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I would like to have a little time in which to discuss it.

Mrs. NORTON. I should be very glad to yield the gentleman 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the report?

There was no objection.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the statement.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 6181) to control the manufacture, transportation, possession, and sale of alcoholic beverages in the District of Columbia, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 5, 6, 18, 53, 54, 63, and 64.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 4, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 38, 39, 41, 42, 43, 45, 46, 47, 49, 51, 52, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 65, 66, and 67, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 3: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 3, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the Senate amendment insert "the product of the normal alcoholic fermentation of the juice of fresh, sound, ripe grapes, with the usual cellar treatment and necessary additions to correct defects due to climatic, saccharine and seasonal conditions, including champagne, sparkling, artificially carbonated and fortified wine. No other product obtained by the fermentation of the natural sugar contents of fruits or other agricultural products containing sugar shall be called 'wine' unless designated by appropriate prefix descriptions of the fruit or other product from which the same was predominantly produced, or as artificial or imitation wine"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 19: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 19, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the Senate amendment insert "but the Commissioners shall not authorize the sale by any licensee, other than the holder of a retailer's license, class E, of any beverages on Sundays, other than light wines and beer, and any such sale is hereby prohibited"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 28: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 28, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the Senate amendment insert "or light wines"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 37: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 37, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On page 6 of the Senate engrossed amendments, in line 5, strike out "a retailer's license" and insert "retailer's licenses"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 40: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 40, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the Senate amendment insert "not, within 5 years prior to the filing of such application, been convicted of a misdemeanor under the National Prohibition Act, as amended and supplemented, or within 10 years prior to such filing, been convicted of any felony"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 44: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 44, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the Senate amendment insert "who has, within 5 years prior thereto, been convicted of a misdemeanor under the National Prohibition Act, as amended and supplemented, or, within 10 years prior thereto, been convicted of any felony"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 48: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 48, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the Senate amendment insert "or tax-free wines"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 50: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 50, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the Senate amendment insert "who has, within 5 years prior thereto, been convicted of a misdemeanor under the National Prohibition Act, as amended and supplemented, or, within 10 years prior thereto, been convicted of any felony"; and the Senate agree to the same.

STATEMENT

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 6181) to control the manufacture, transportation, possession, and sale of alcoholic beverages in the District of Columbia, submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conferees and recommended in the accompanying conference report:

The following amendments make clerical changes, and the House recedes: 7, 8, 11, 12, 14, 17, 20, 21, 24, 32, 39, 41, 45, 46, 47, 51, 55, 56, 57, 61, 62, and 67.

On amendment no. 1: The House bill repealed the National Prohibition Act and all acts supplemental to and amendatory thereof insofar as they related to alcoholic beverages in the District of Columbia upon which the Federal tax has been paid with certain exceptions. The Senate amendment clarifies the language and omits the limitation to beverages upon which the Federal tax has been paid. The House recedes.

On amendment no. 2: This amendment changes the short title of the bill; and the House recedes.

On amendment no. 3: The House bill adopted the definition of wine contained in the internal-revenue laws, which includes only natural wines the product of grapes. The Senate amendment defines wine as any alcoholic beverage obtained by the fermentation of the natural sugar contents of fruits or other agricultural products containing sugar, including all artificial or imitation wines, and also including fortified wines, such as port and sherry. The House recedes with an amendment defining wine as the product of the normal alcoholic fermentation of the juice of fresh, sound, ripe grapes, with the usual cellar treatment and necessary additions to correct defects due to climatic, saccharine, and seasonal conditions, including champagne, sparkling, artificially carbonated, and fortified wine; and providing that no other product obtained by the fermentation of the natural sugar contents of fruits or other agricultural products containing sugar shall be called "wine" unless designated by appropriate prefix descriptions of the fruit or other product from which the same was predominantly produced, or as artificial or imitation wine.

On amendment no. 4: The House bill excepted from the definition of light wines champagne and any wine artificially carbonated. The Senate amendment strikes out the exception as to artificially carbonated wine. The House recedes.

On amendment no. 5: This amendment provides that no wine not manufactured from grapes shall be sold unless the container bears a label stating the products from which it was manufactured. The Senate recedes in conformity with the action of the conferees on amendment no. 3.

On amendment no. 6: The House bill provided that to be included within the definition of "hotel" an establishment must have 30 or more rooms for transient guests. The Senate amendment requires 50 or more rooms. The Senate recedes.

On amendments nos. 9 and 13: The House bill provided that at least one of the members of the board should be a woman and that the members of the board could be removed by the Commissioners only for cause and after service of written charges and opportunity to be heard thereon. Senate amendment no. 9 strikes out the requirement that one member of the board shall be a woman and provides that the members of the board shall be "subject to removal by the Commissioners"; and Senate amendment no. 13 strikes out the provision that they may be removed only for cause and after service of written charges and opportunity to be heard. The House recedes on these amendments.

On amendment no. 10: The House bill fixed the salary of the members of the board at $6,000. The Senate amendment reduces this figure to $5,000. The House recedes.

On amendment no. 15: This amendment gives to the Commissioners the power to limit the number of licenses of each class to be issued in the District and to limit the number of licenses of each class in any locality, section, or portion of the District as they may deem proper in the public interest. The House bill contained no such provision. The House recedes.

On amendment no. 16: The House bill gave the Commissioners authority to forbid the issuance of licenses for businesses established subsequent to April 5, 1933 (the date of the enactment of the Beer Act), near or around schools, churches, or public institutions. The Senate amendment moves this date up to the date of the enactment of this act; and the House recedes.

On amendment no. 18: This amendment gives the Commissioners power to forbid the sale of beverages on Christmas Day. The House bill contained no such provision. The Senate recedes.

On amendment no. 19: This amendment provides that the Commissioners shall not authorize the sale of any beverages on Sunday or Christmas Day, other than light wines and beer, and prohibits any such sale; but excepts from this provision sale by the holders of druggist's licenses for sale on prescription. The House recedes with an amendment striking out the prohibition as to Christmas Day.

On amendment no. 22: The House bill required a solicitor's license for anyone offering for sale or soliciting any orders for the sale, within the District of Columbia, of alcoholic beverages and required that the vendor in such cases must be the holder of a manufacturer's license, class A or class B or a wholesaler's license, class A or class B. The Senate amendment requires a solicitor's license whether the sale is to be made within or without the District of Columbia. The House recedes.

On amendment no. 23: This amendment permits physicians, dentists, veterinarians, and persons in charge of hospitals or sanatoriums to administer alcoholic beverages to bona fide patients or inmates. The House recedes.

On amendments nos. 25 and 26: The House bill fixed the fee for retailer's licenses, class C, for railroad cars at $5 per month, or $50 per annum. The Senate amendments provide that this fee shall be $2 per month, or $20 per annum. On these amendments the House recedes.

On amendments nos. 27, 28, 29, and 30: These amendments permit the holders of retailer's licenses, class D, to sell light wines as well as beer. The House bill limited such licensees to the sale of beer. The House recedes on amendments nos. 27, 29, and 30; and on amendment no. 28 with a perfecting amendment.

On amendment no. 31: The House bill provided that the annual fee for retailer's licenses, class D, should be $200. The Senate amendment provides that in the case of marine vessels the fee shall be $20 per month, or $200 per annum, and in the case of railroad cars $1 per month, or $10 per annum. The House recedes.

On amendment no. 33: The House bill provided that the solicitor's license should be issued only to the representatives of manufacturers or wholesalers holding licenses in the District of Columbia. The Senate amendment strikes out this requirement. In conformity with the action of the conferees on amendment no. 22 the House recedes.

On amendment no. 34: The House bill fixed the fee for the solicitor's license at $2 per annum. The Senate amendment increased this fee to $100; and the House recedes.

On amendments nos. 35 and 37: The House bill provided that retailer's licenses class A or class B should not be issued or remain in force in respect of any premises for which a retailer's license class C or class D has been issued, and that no holder of a retailer's license, except a retailer's license class E, should hold directly or indirectly any other retailer's license. The Senate amendments strike out these provisions, and amendment no. 37 permits the holders of retailer's licenses class C and class D to hold other licenses of the same class or of class E, but specifically prohibits holders of retailer's licenses class A or class B from holding any other type of license except retailer's licenses class E. The House recedes on amendment no. 35 and on amendment no. 37, with a clarifying amendment.

On amendment no. 36: The Senate amendment makes it clear that the only manufacturer who may hold a wholesaler's license within the District of Columbia is the owner of a manufacturing establishment located outside the District. The House recedes.

On amendment no. 38: The House bill provided that the holder of a solicitor's license could not pay proportionately any license fee. The Senate amendment strikes out this provision, and the House recedes.

On amendment no. 40: The House bill provided that before a license should be issued the board should satisfy itself that the applicant, and in the case of a partnership the members of the partnership, and in the case of a corporation its principal officers, has never been convicted of a felony. The Senate amendment adds as an additional requirement that they shall not have been convicted of an offense under the National Prohibition Act, and limits both requirements to convictions within a period of 10 years. The House recedes with an amendment providing that the applicant shall not, within 5 years prior to the filing of his application, have been convicted of a misdemeanor under the National Prohibition Act or, within 10 years prior to such filing, have been convicted of any felony.

On amendment no. 42: The House bill required the applicant for a license to have surety approved by the board. The Senate amendment requires corporate surety approved by the board. The House recedes.

On amendment no. 43: The House bill provided that no surety should have, directly or indirectly, any financial interest in the business of the licensee. The Senate amendment strikes out this provision, and the House recedes.

On amendment no. 44: The House bill gave the Commissioners power to revoke a license of any licensee who employs in the sale or distribution of beverages any person who has been convicted of a felony. The Senate amendment extends this condition to include offenses under the National Prohibition Act and limits both these conditions to convictions within 10 years. The House recedes with an amendment providing as the condition for revocation that the person employed shall, within 5 years prior to the time of employment, have been convicted of a misdemeanor under the National Prohibition Act, or, within 10 years prior to such time, have been convicted of any felony.

On amendment no. 48: This amendment provides that the requirements that beverages produced outside the District and transported into the District for resale be reported to the board shall not apply to light wines. The House recedes with an amendment excepting only tax-free wines.

On amendment no. 49: This amendment provides that the requirements that beverages produced outside the District and transported into the District for resale be reported to the board shall not apply to beverages transported on railroad club or dining cars or marine vessels for sale thereon. The House recedes.

On amendment no. 50: The House bill made it an offense for any licensee to allow any person to deal in beverages who has been convicted of a felony. The Senate amendment extends this prohibition to include persons convicted of an offense under the National Prohibition Act, but limits both requirements to convictions within a period of 10 years. The House recedes with an amendment providing that the prohibition includes persons who, within 5 years prior to the offense, have been convicted of a misdemeanor under the National Prohibition Act, or, within 10 years prior thereto, have been convicted of any felony.

On amendment no. 52: The House bill made it an offense for any person to be drunk or intoxicated in any place (including a vehicle) mentioned in the act, or at any public gathering, or to be drunk or intoxicated and to disturb the peace of any person anywhere. The Senate amendment clarifies the language of the House bill and prohibits the drinking of alcoholic beverages in any street, alley, park or parking, or in any place to which the public is invited, unless such place is licensed for the sale of liquors for consumption on the premises. The amendment also clarifies the provision with respect to intoxication. The House recedes.

On amendments nos. 53 and 54: The Senate amendment repeals certain existing laws prohibiting the sale, transportation, and possession of intoxicating liquors on military reservations and naval stations. On these amendments the Senate recedes.

On amendments nos. 58 and 59: The House bill permitted a druggist holding a permit under the National Prohibition Act to continue the sale of alcoholic beverages as provided in such permit for such period as the Commissioners may designate, not to exceed 60 days after the approval of the act. The Senate amendments relieve such sales from the limitations of the act as to the sale of rectified or blended spirits and the prohibition on sale by holders of retailer's licenses, class E, of liquors other than those defined by the United States Pharmacopœia. The House recedes.

On amendment no. 60: This amendment requires the affixing to the containers of all rectified or blended spirits sold by druggists under the National Prohibition Act permits of a label containing a legend in letters not less than 1 inch high: "Rectified spirits" or "Blended spirits." The House recedes.

On amendments nos. 63 and 64: The House bill prohibited any holder of a retailer's license, except a retailer's license class E, from selling any alcoholic beverages on credit except beer and light wines; but provided that the prohibition should not apply to sales to guests and members by hotels and clubs. The Senate amendments limit this prohibition to holders of retailer's license class C or class D, and remove the exception as to beer and light wines. The Senate recedes.

On amendment no. 65: The House bill required that the container of rectified or blended spirits sold should bear a label stating the nature and percentage of each ingredient therein and the age of such ingredient. The Senate amendment excepts water from this requirement; and the House recedes.

On amendment no. 66: This amendment adds to the bill a new section containing the usual saving clause continuing prosecutions for violations of provisions of law repealed by the act. The House recedes.

MARY T. NORTON,
GALE H. STALKER,
VINCENT L. PALMISANO,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. SWEENEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentlewoman from New Jersey yield to me in order that I may present a request for unanimous consent?

Mrs. NORTON. Yes.

Mr. SWEENEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Clerk be permitted to read for the purposes of the RECORD a letter sent to me by Rev. Charles E. Coughlin, the radio priest of Detroit, Mich. The letter touches on the activities of Congress, and I am sure it will prove of interest to every Member of this body.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, does this pertain to the matter before the House at the present time, the District of Columbia liquor bill?

The SPEAKER. It does not.

Mr. SNELL. I think at the present time we would better conclude the report.

Mr. SWEENEY. I may say to the gentleman that the letter touches upon the activities of Congress, and I am sure he will be satisfied after it is read.

Mr. SNELL. For the present I shall object.

Mr. SWEENEY. I now ask unanimous consent that the letter I am referring to be taken up immediately after the conclusion of the conference report.

Mr. SNELL. I would not want to give any such general consent as that.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman later.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that the corporate bonds are desired so that the District authorities may have the benefit of the information and wide investigation that reputable bonding companies make before writing bonds. If an applicant for a bond has a bad record in another jurisdiction, a private surety seldom knows of it, but the record of the bonding company always shows it and the bonding companies know it and refuse to write a bond unless the record is good. Then, too, the private bondsman may be worth the penalty in the bond when written but may not be worth it when and if the penalty falls upon him, in which case he may, through an appeal to the judge on personal grounds, get out of paying.

Druggists, under the advice of the Treasury Department, bought large quantities of liquor in order to get it before the prices skyrocketed. They have it on hand. Under this bill they are required to have a label on the bottle with letters at least 1 inch high showing it to be blended or rectified liquor; certainly this provision takes care of the people who purchase that liquor.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the adoption of the report.

The previous question was ordered.

The conference report was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to was laid on the table.

RESIGNATION FROM COMMITTEE

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following resignation, which was read:

JANUARY 19, 1934.

Hon. HENRY T. RAINEY,
Speaker of the House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: I do hereby tender my resignation as a member of the following committees, to wit: Public Roads, Public Lands, Elections No. 1, World War Veterans.

Yours very truly,

C. A. FULLER.

The resignation was accepted.

APPOINTMENT TO COMMITTEE

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I present a privileged resolution and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 229

Resolved, That CLAUDE A. FULLER, of Arkansas, be, and he is hereby, elected a member of the Committee on Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

HOUR OF MEETING TOMORROW

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourn today it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock tomorrow.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do not intend to raise any technical objection to any program that is settled on by the majority party, but when I consider the public statements that have been made relative to the work of this Congress and the consideration that we were going to give legislation; when I contrast that with the way we are proceeding, I think I should make a short statement. I want to say once again with all the emphasis at my command that the minority are absolutely opposed to the way we are considering important legislation in the present session of Congress. The bill we are going to take up tomorrow, as I have said before, is, in my judgment, one of the most important pieces of legislation affecting the people of this country that has been before Congress in the last 50 years. When I think of the many times Members now sitting on the Democratic side have twitted the Republicans for following their administration's recommendation, I cannot but contrast it with the procedure of the gentleman's party, for when we were responsible for the program every one of the bills were introduced in the usual way, referred to committees, given extensive public hearings, reports on them published, and the bills taken up under the general rules of the House where every man was fully informed.

In my judgment, not 10 percent of the Members of the House know the substance of the legislation we are to take up tomorrow or what its effect on this country is going to be. I doubt if 5 percent of the Members are able to make an intelligent statement in regard to it. This is not our idea of the right way to legislate. We believe duly elected Representatives have some responsibility resting on them, to do some thinking and acting for themselves. Considering the record you have made so far—considering what you have said to us in the past—I think I am justified in saying that the present Democratic majority of this House is probably the most spineless majority, and does less thinking for itself than any majority that has ever controlled this House.

So far as we are concerned, it makes no difference whether you meet at 11, at 10, or at 9 o'clock; we are willing to be here. But we are just opposed to this method of legislating and we want the country to know it, and where the real responsibility lies for such unjustified action. I shall not object to the gentleman's request.

Mr. BYRNS. May I ask the gentleman this question: Is he for or against this bill?

Mr. SNELL. I do not know enough about it to intelligently state at the present time; and I doubt if the gentleman himself does. [Applause.]

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I made this request simply for the accommodation of what I believe to be the convenience of the House and the request of a number of gentlemen on the Republican side of the House as well as on this side of the House.

Mr. SNELL. I have no objection whatever to the request. I am speaking of the general course pursued in the matter of consideration.

Mr. BYRNS. This request, I may say, is made in order that we may give full consideration and discussion to this bill and adjourn at a reasonable hour tomorrow; because it is deemed of the utmost importance that this bill be concluded tomorrow in order to give the Senate an opportunity to take it up on Monday and, we hope, pass it prior to next Tuesday.

Now, so far as consideration of the bill is concerned, the gentleman knows this bill was referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures day before yesterday; the gentleman knows this committee submitted a report at 12 o'clock yesterday; the gentleman knows they conducted hearings yesterday afternoon.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield at this point? He is stating what the gentleman knows.

Mr. BYRNS. And I assume the committee is in session today and will be in session in the morning.

I can see no valid reason for wanting to delay consideration of this bill, as the gentleman suggests be done, especially when the chairman of that committee and others have stated that it is costing this country $2,000,000 every day we delay consideration and passage of the bill.

Mr. SNELL. I said in my opening statement that I was not going to object to the consideration of the bill. I did not state that we were opposed to the bill; I said we were opposed to legislating in the manner we have been doing this session. The gentleman, having been here longer than I, knows far better than I that no man knows anything about this bill; and it is not fair to pass it without the consideration its importance entitles it to. In regard to the report, this important and complicated bill was referred to the committee one day and reported out the next. Up to 11 o'clock this morning I did not see any printed report of the committee. What good is there in hearings after the bill has been approved by the committee and on the calendar?

Mr. BYRNS. Yes; and the gentleman from New York heard the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MCGUGIN], a member of the gentleman's party, state upon yesterday on the floor of this House that the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, of which he is a member, had been holding hearings on this general subject for a year and a half. The gentleman from Kansas said, as will appear from the RECORD, that he thought the bill could be taken up on Saturday and concluded one way or the other; and, so far as he was concerned, as I understood him, he had no objection to it. In view of the importance of speedy action, in the interest of the entire country, I cannot understand the obvious hopes of the gentleman for delay. Ample time for a full and complete discussion will be afforded tomorrow.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman knows the principal points of the bill have never heretofore been before Congress, so they could not have had hearings on it.

Mr. BYRNS. I understood the gentleman to complain that this side of the House was rather spineless in its consideration of this bill. May I make a prediction? It is that the gentleman from New York himself will vote for this bill tomorrow and has already made up his mind to do so. Then why this argument for delay? [Applause.]

Mr. SNELL. That is not the question before the House. Members of the gentleman's side have twitted us for years about following the leader, but we always did it in the usual manner as prescribed by the rules of the House of Representatives.

Mr. BYRNS. That is what we are doing.

Mr. SNELL. We always gave some consideration to important measures.

Mr. BYRNS. That is what we are doing in this instance.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock tomorrow?

There was no objection.

Mr. SWEENEY. Mr. Speaker, apropos the remarks of the minority leader and the majority leader, I renew my request that the Clerk be permitted to read a letter addressed to me by the Rev. Charles E. Coughlin, the radio priest of Detroit, Mich., whose audience every Sunday is estimated to be 50,000,000 persons. This letter touches upon the activities of Congress and the rights of this Congress. I am sure it will be of interest to everybody concerned.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

SHRINE OF THE LITTLE FLOWER,
NATIONAL LEAGUE OF THE LITTLE FLOWER,
LOCATED AT WOODWARD AVENUE AND TWELVE-MILE ROAD,
Royal Oak, Mich., January 8, 1934.

(NOTE.—Please mail your reply to Rev. Charles E. Coughlin, post-office box 150, Detroit, Mich.)

The Honorable MARTIN L. SWEENEY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR MR. SWEENEY: I thank you for your letter of December 4 and extend to you my best wishes for a courageous, prosperous career on the floor of the House.

I am of the opinion that you will have to indicate to many of the Congressmen and Senators that Mr. Roosevelt is not a dictator; that he does not expect either the House or the Senate to be sublimated rubber stamps.

In other words, initiative must be taken by you and your colleagues to pass remedial measures.

You are the legislative body. The President is the executive body.

I appreciate that with all the confidence which we have been instrumental in building up around the name of Roosevelt, our people, sorry to say, are beginning to regard him as another Hitler or Mussolini. Dictatorship can never exist in the United States because of the size of the country and because of the complexity of our problems.

Moreover, Mr. Roosevelt, if I interpret him rightly, entertains no foolish idea of regarding himself as a monarch. He would be the first to lament the trend of present political psychology which has so involved our mental attitude.

I mean, for instance, that the people of the United States elected you Congressmen and Senators to be their representatives in formulating and enacting legislation. Congress, to be more explicit, and Congress alone has the right to regulate and coin money. It is Congress again that is vested with the rights to deal with our agricultural situation and with our labor problem.

Now these rights and duties dare not be sidestepped nor delegated to professors or to appointees who are not the representatives of the American people.

There is danger that unless both Senators and Congressmen eradicate from their minds this rubber-stamp attitude, this Seventy-third Congress will witness the passing of American democracy in a great measure.

There is no one who regards and respects Mr. Roosevelt more than I do. There is no one who has spoken more boldly in defense of his principles than have I.

But the time has arrived when the preservation of the American Constitution must be demanded. To preserve it we must preserve the integrity of our Senators and Congressmen.

Trusting that you will be a fervent defender of the rights and duties of our legislative body; trusting that you and your colleagues will be constantly imbued with the idea of your personally rectifying our rotten financial system instead of becoming a group of acquiescing sycophants, may I remain,

Cordially yours,

CHAS. E. COUGHLIN.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate agrees to the report of the Committee of Conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 6181) entitled "An act to control the manufacture, transportation, possession, and sale of alcoholic beverages in the District of Columbia."

FILING OF MINORITY VIEWS ON H.R. 6976

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, I ask unanimous consent to file minority views on the bill (H.R. 6976) to protect the currency system of the United States, to provide for the better use of the monetary gold stock of the United States, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Idaho?

There was no objection.

THE ELLENBOGEN MEASURE, H.R. 6564, PROVIDES FOR HOME-LOAN RELIEF AND A REVIVAL OF THE CONSTRUCTION INDUSTRY

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including therein an editorial in the Pittsburgh Press, a leading Scripps-Howard paper, on Mortgage Relief, and discussing the bill I introduced, H.R. 6564.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following:

[From the Pittsburgh Press of Jan. 18, 1934]

SPREADING MORTGAGE RELIEF

The Home Owners' Loan Act needs some rewriting if it is to do a good job of saving distressed home owners from mortgage foreclosure.

The present law contains too many limitations to function with 100 percent success. For one thing, it restricts the Home Owners' Loan Corporation to $2,000,000,000 worth of loans, whereas probably twice that much is needed.

For another, the act guarantees only the interest and not the principal of H.O.L.C. bonds—a feature that has made thousands of mortgage holders chary of accepting the securities. Finally, the bonds have not been made as attractive as other Government issues. They are not eligible for rediscount at the Federal Reserve banks. Nor have they the circulation privileges of most Government securities.

As a result of these handicaps, the Home Owners' Loan Corporation has had difficult sledding during its first 6 months. True, it has saved thousands of home owners from foreclosure. But the job is by no means complete.

And there is little likelihood that it will be until the law itself is subjected to some revision.

A bill now is before Congress to remedy these weaknesses in the present Home Owners Loan Act. It was introduced by Congressman HENRY ELLENBOGEN, of Pittsburgh, and is of vital interest to every home owner in the country.

The Ellenbogen bill gives the Home Loan Corporation power to issue $5,000,000,000 in bonds instead of the present $2,000,000,000 limitation. It also guarantees the principal as well as the interest of the bonds, and makes them eligible for rediscount at the Federal Reserve banks.

Moreover, the measure authorizes the Home Owners' Loan Corporation to make loans in bonds for new construction—the limit being 75 percent of the cost of the house and lot—and to issue loans, also in bonds, on mortgage-free houses.

The one feature would help to revive the building industry and would spur the construction of new homes. The other would make property a borrowable asset again instead of a frozen liability.

Naturally, all these changes proposed by the Ellenbogen measure would reverse completely the present status of home-loan bonds. They would become the most desirable of securities instead of being regarded with suspicion.

And in order not to make them too attractive the Pittsburgh Congressman proposes that the interest rate on the bonds be cut from 4 to 3½ percent and that the tax exemption be removed. This would both increase the Corporation's margin of profit—it now loans money at 5-percent interest—and provide the Government with another source of revenue.

Furthermore, it would be the first step toward the elimination of tax-exempt securities—a step that must be taken sooner or later in order to prevent wealth from escaping its just share of taxation.

The press believes the Ellenbogen measure is one of the most important pieces of legislation before the present Congress.

It seems to be carefully and skillfully drawn; and while it may have defects, its major provisions are fundamentally sound and are badly needed.

INTERIOR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL, FISCAL YEAR 1935

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H.R. 6951) making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. Cox in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Examination and inspection of projects: For examination of accounts and inspection of the works of various projects and divisions of projects operated and maintained by irrigation districts or water users' associations, and bookkeeping, accounting, clerical, legal, and other expenses incurred in accordance with contract provisions for the repayment of such expenses by the districts or associations, the unexpended balance of the appropriation for this purpose for the fiscal year 1934 is continued available for the same purpose for the fiscal year 1935.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, on page 48, line 12, I move to strike out the words "bookkeeping, accounting, clerical, and legal."

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLANTON: On page 48, line 12, strike out the words "bookkeeping, accounting, clerical, and legal."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, the best piece of work that this Congress ever performed was in June 1921, when by an organic act it created the General Accounting Office. That act made the General Accounting Office wholly independent of all executive departments and responsible only to the Comptroller General of the United States, under whose direction it was placed. This act also created the position of Comptroller General of the United States and made him absolutely independent of the Executive or any executive department. It made him responsible only to the Congress of the United States.

This was absolutely necessary in order that Congress could be assured at all times that the money which this Congress appropriates in huge sums out of the Treasury, the tax money of the people of the United States, was expended by Department heads and Bureau chiefs strictly according to law.

During the years since 1921 many complaints have been made against the Comptroller General of the United States by high executive officers, heads of departments, various Secretaries of the Navy and Secretaries of War, big admirals and big generals, who have sat across the table from him and disliked his actions in requiring that the expenditure of this money should conform to law. When they did not like what he did they criticized him in the newspapers. When they did not like his restrictions they would say, "We are going to overturn him." When they did not like his requiring them to conform to the law in expending money that the Congress had appropriated they would say, "We are going to the White House and make him capitulate and make him do this and do that." But they have never made him do anything yet. The White House is always with him and behind him.

He is responsible alone to the Congress of the United States that created his office. He is being severely criticized now because he will not permit $100,000,000 to be turned over to a Delaware corporation with the powers that it would have under its corporate life and existence to sign promissory notes and to create new bonded indebtedness at its own instance and in violation of the law of Congress. The press asserts, "Oh, he will be made to do as wanted."

The distinguished Comptroller General of the United States, Hon. J. R. McCarl, is an honest man, a man of great ability, a man who is always dependable, a man who is absolutely fearless, and a man who will never yield 1 inch from what he considers to be his duty under the law to see that money is properly expended. He is one of our greatest and most valuable public servants in the Nation. He deserves thanks from the 120,000,000 American people.

I have taken the time of the House this morning to again let him know that the Congress of the United States, in my judgment, is back of him to a man. They are back of his great Accounting Office. Carry on, General McCarl; we are backing you. The press here, the other day, criticized him because, foresooth, Congress saw fit to fix his term of office for 15 years. Congress had a reason for that. Congress wanted to see to it that he could perform his duty untrammeled and uninfluenced by the lobbyists that come to Washington.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my amendment, which was a pro forma one.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment is withdrawn.

There was no objection.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Yesterday at the time of adjournment I withdrew a pro forma amendment that I offered at that time for the purpose of inquiring into one of these appropriations that appear on page 33 of the report, with reference to construction, operation, and maintenance of irrigation systems, $311,500.

The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR], chairman of the subcommittee called my attention to page 700 of the committee hearings, on which page appears a memorandum on the part of the Department with reference to this item.

It does not seem that this was carried as a permanent appropriation last year on page 33 of the report, and I am wondering why. It would seem to me from reading the hearings that they are spending something like $600,000 in the current year, and that this was under the provisions of a law of 1914. Is that correct?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes, that is correct. I will also direct the gentleman's attention to the language in the sixth line from the bottom on page 700 of the hearings, reading as follows:

The item is inserted in the text of the Budget in view of the fact that the Bureau of the Budget insists that expenditures from these collections be taken into account in arriving at the total expenditure for the Indian Service.

These are collections that come in and we are simply authorizing them, the same as has been done for many years, to expend the money in this way. There is nothing new about it, and, strictly speaking, as I said yesterday, I inserted that tabulation in my report on this bill because I thought it was very important information for the House to have in order that the Members would be fully advised about the activities of the Government official as affecting these enterprises that pertain to the Interior Department and which ordinarily would be handled by this committee, but which we are not handling in any way now. At the same time these activities are being and always will be greatly benefited by the appropriations, and I think in the main they are very judiciously apportioned and necessary and will be largely self-liquidating in the long run.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I think we should compliment the committee on having inserted this table in its report. I think it is of the utmost importance that the Congress, through its proper committees, should bring these facts before the country. For instance, this page of the report of the committee gives every one of us an opportunity to know what is being spent on a lot of things that heretofore we did not know about unless we made a special investigation. It lets us know, for instance, that the sum of $1,912,000 goes to colleges for agriculture. It lets us know that $5,500,000 goes to vocational training, and all that sort of thing, which we would not know when considering the ordinary appropriations, and we ought to have such information before us at that time.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I thank the gentleman; that was our idea. We felt the House was entitled to have this succinct tabulation of very important information.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

I do this early in the reading of the bill to secure some information with respect to the item on page 72 under heading of "Office of Education—Federal Board for Vocational Education."

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Will not the gentleman wait until we reach that item in the reading of the bill?

Mr. GOSS. I would like to get some advance information, if the gentleman does not mind.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Very well.

Mr. GOSS. I notice on page 30 of the report that we have cut down this item by $1,534,900, and we have cut down the permanent appropriation by $602,190. On page 30 of the report there is shown the Budget estimate of $1,222,000; but in the bill, from page 72 to page 76, I cannot find any of these figures inserted. Can the gentleman tell us how the committee arrived at that amount?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Has the gentleman the report before him?

Mr. GOSS. Yes; and on page 73 of the bill there is an item of $22,500 and one of $822,750.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. If the gentleman will look at page 29 of the report, he will find the information in the last four items on that page and in the same order as given in the bill.

Mr. GOSS. That is correct; but when we turn to page 30 of the same report, under the heading of "Office of Education", there is an item of $78,750, another item of $989,800, and I would like to inquire where those items are carried in the bill.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. That is the total of the items.

Mr. HASTINGS. And one of them is for Puerto Rico.

Mr. GOSS. Then, so we may understand it, we have reduced this item for vocational education this year by $2,137,090?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. No; look on page 30 of the report, the second item in the right-hand column.

Mr. GOSS. That shows a reduction of 1½ million dollars.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes; $1,497,900.

Mr. GOSS. If the gentleman will turn to page 33 of the report, under the item listing the permanent and indefinite appropriations, the gentleman will notice a reduction of $602,000, in addition.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. As the gentleman well knows, this subcommittee has nothing whatever to do with that.

Mr. GOSS. But will not the gentleman admit that we are going to have $600,000 less to expend under this item this year than we had last year?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I think that is correct.

Mr. GOSS. So our total reduction is $2,000,000.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. If the gentleman will permit me to interrupt, that is due to the 25-percent horizontal reduction made by Executive order of the President and the Budget, and this committee followed that order.

Mr. GOSS. But suppose someone interested in the item of vocational education desired to do so, where could an amendment be offered to change that?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I do not see where any amendment could be put in to change that, because that matter is not in this bill at all.

Mr. GOSS. I agree with the gentleman, but that is part of the total amount spent for vocational education. Where we get the money from is immaterial.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Strictly speaking, I think such an amendment would be legislation and subject to a point of order, and the gentleman would be the first one to make a point of order against it.

Mr. GOSS. No; the gentleman does not make points of order against things he is interested in, at least.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The gentleman makes a good many of them.

Mr. GOSS. Can the gentleman point our where that can be reached in the bill? In other words, if a Member of the House wanted to restore any of the $2,000,000 that has been taken from the appropriations for vocational education, where could such an amendment be offered?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. If the gentleman will permit, that would be modifying permanent law, and would not be in order at any place in the bill.

Mr. GOSS. That is true only to the extent of the $600,000.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Well, that is quite an item.

Mr. GOSS. But there is a reduction of a million and a half dollars in addition to that.

Mr. HASTINGS. May I suggest to the gentleman that we take that up when these items on pages 73, 74, and 75 are reached?

Mr. GOSS. As the gentleman knows, if we do that, we will not have time to prepare amendments.

Mr. HASTINGS. If the gentleman wants to offer an amendment to increase any of those amounts, I am sure such an amendment would be in order to those items but not to amend the permanent appropriation.

Mr. GOSS. Would you offer an amendment changing the amount at the bottom of page 73?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. If both of the gentlemen will yield to me a moment, you will recall that what is known as the "George-Reed law" has been in effect for, I think, some 5 or 6 years. It carried with it about $1,275,000 a year. You will find that on page 29 of the report. This law expires on the 1st day of July of this year, and we have no authority to reappropriate any money for a law that has expired. This bill goes into effect the 1st of July of this year, and this accounts for that situation.

All the rest of the reduction that is made in the item for vocational education, aside from that amount accounted for by th eexpiration of the George-Reed law, is accounted for by the horizontal 25-percent reduction that the Democratic Party promised in its national platform, and the President himself repeatedly promised, and the Budget made that cut accordingly, and the Appropriations Committee and this subcommittee have carried out. That is the exact explanation.

Mr. GOSS. We are going to have $2,000,000 less available next year for that purpose, for one reason or another.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. This subcommittee is not responsible, the main Committee on Appropriations is not responsible for legislative acts or for their expirations. Why does the gentleman criticize the committee for not making an appropriation to carry on a law that has expired? We have no authority to appropriate more money for an extinct law.

The Clerk read as follows:

Yuma project, Arizona-California: For operation and maintenance, $37,200: Provided, That not to exceed $25,000 from the power revenues shall be available during the fiscal year 1935 for the operation and maintenance of the commercial system;

Mr. GILCHRIST. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word to ask a question of the gentleman from Colorado. This is the first specific appropriation for irrigation in the bill. We have arrived at that place where specific appropriations for projects are being made. As I understand, there are no new projects for irrigation or reclamation involved in this bill.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Not one.

Mr. GILCHRIST. I would like to ask the gentleman what new projects are involved in the Public Works Administration and how much is involved in taking care of new irrigation in new districts?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I have a complete list here, which I will insert in the RECORD.

The list is as follows:

Appropriation	1 Appropriated and/or made available	2 Plus unobligated balances June 30, 1933, available for obligation	3 Plus N.R.A. allotments	4 Plus transfers from other departments	5 Minus impoundments pursuant to law	6 Minus amount reserved at the direction of the President	7 Minus transfers to other departments	8 Net amount available for obligation

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The gentleman will see it amounts to $104,000,000, covering practically every Western State that has a reclamation project. It covers a very large and wide field of irrigation and power development throughout the West.

Mr. GILCHRIST. Has the gentleman any information as to which policy we are to endorse and follow—that which appropriates money for projects to bring more land into cultivation or that which appropriates money to cut out land from cultivation, to plow up cotton, to decrease corn and wheat areas—two courses that are inconsistent with each other?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The gentleman does not expect me to take up the time of the House to go into all the details of all of that vast contemplated development throughout the 15 Western States. It affects the whole economic policy of this administration. I presume that there will be many mistakes and some waste. This committee has no authority in the premises at this time. It is being handled as an Executive matter—largely as a relief matter for those States. Congress has not been consulted about those vast allotments.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I yield.

Mr. BLANCHARD. How much more is appropriated for reclamation and irrigation for this fiscal year than was appropriated for the last fiscal year—in total?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The gentleman means in the bill?

Mr. BLANCHARD. No; in public works and in the bill.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The total appropriation carried in this bill is over $19,000,000 less than it was a year ago. A very large part of that reduction was on the reclamation work.

Mr. BLANCHARD. With the public works in mind, what is the difference?

Mr. HASTINGS. The reduction amounts to $10,190,250.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The additions thus far made by the Public Works Administration is $104,000,000.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. In placing this information in the RECORD will the gentleman incorporate the number of acres that these projects cover and the amount of the cost of each project?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I can give the gentleman the amounts and names and places of the allotments now made to each project. No one knows what they will all ultimately cost. No human being can definitely estimate that. And it is not possible to estimate the exact acreage. Nobody ever knows when he starts out on a reclamation project just how much irrigable land it is going to be feasible to irrigate under it. There are many elements of uncertainty in every large reclamation project.

Mr. DOWELL. There is no one on the floor I think better qualified to make an estimate of just what this will run into in dollars and also in acreage than the gentleman. Would the gentleman give us the benefit of his knowledge on this and give us some information as to what these projects are going to cost in the future?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. As I have repeatedly said, this matter has not come before our committee at all. We simply know from the public-works report how much that Board has allocated for all of these things. We do not know what basis they took for it. We do not know the merits of those projects. I am frank to say that this committee has in former years declined to approve some of these projects, but we may have been wrong, and they may be meritorious at this time, in view of the lack of employment. I understand the policy of the Federal Government is to make these allotments where they can find useful work that will develop the country, where it will be of permanent benefit. Whether or not it is economically sound, this is largely emergency work to relieve desperately tragic conditions of destitution.

Mr. DOWELL. I think the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GILCHRIST] made the suggestion that whether or not this is of value depends on which way we are going in this matter of putting land under cultivation and taking it out of cultivation. The program now is to reduce the acreage in agricultural lands. In view of that I think this House ought to have the information as to approximately how much land is to be put under cultivation by this method of this Department. I would like to have the information that the committee or that the gentleman has with reference to it.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I asked Dr. Mead, the Commissioner of the Bureau of Reclamation, what his estimate was of the total ultimate cost of all these projects that they have allotted this $104,000,000 for in all these States. He said he thought the total cost would be $200,000,000. But he did not give us any estimate as to the acreage it would cover. But the gentleman realizes that this great program of construction of reclamation is largely for the purpose of developing and utilizing the power of these streams to benefit thousands of people, who are not engaged in farming. The House should understand that it is going to require several years to complete all those projects.

We all hope that times will change; we all hope there will not be a surplus of produce. One other thing I might say, and that is that all the produce raised in the United States from all of the Government reclamation projects that we have today is less than 1 percent of the agricultural produce of the United States, so that we do not come in competition with the farmers of the Middle or Eastern or Southern States the way the gentleman assumes.

Mr. DOWELL. What I was trying to get, and that is what I think the gentleman has given, is the information of this committee with reference to the policy that is being pursued relative to putting these lands under cultivation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words to interrogate the chairman of the subcommittee for a moment. The gentleman stated that some of these projects that are now being put in work by these various relief phases of the administration's program had been disapproved by his committee.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I will not say that they have been disapproved. I say that we have heretofore declined to appropriate money for some of them.

Mr. CULKIN. Is it not a fact that at least on four occasions the gentleman's committee, which has technical charge of these projects, has rejected the Casper-Alcova project?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. We have never appropriated money for that project. But I ought in frankness to say it has never had a legal status.

Mr. CULKIN. And it was the judgment of the gentleman's committee that these projects were uneconomic and uncalled for at this time? Is not that true?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Of course, every time we declined to appropriate for a project we thought it was uneconomic for us to spend the money for it at that time.

Mr. CULKIN. And in a sense the gentleman's committee is more or less consecrated to the subject of reclamation?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Oh, yes.

Mr. CULKIN. The gentleman believes in it?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I certainly do.

Mr. CULKIN. But under the present set-up the administration is going ahead with the development of the Casper-Alcova project, Wyoming, with an allocation of some $23,000,000.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The older Members of the House know that I fought that project for many years, and I prevented the passage of a bill creating it. But I should candidly say that my opposition was primarily because they were trying to take the water to supply it from my district in Colorado without respecting or protecting our rights, as well as because the Secretary of the Interior had twice reported against it as not being such as to justify its construction. He said it would not justify the cost of construction.

Mr. CULKIN. And the gentleman still believes it is an economic fallacy?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I am not speaking for the whole committee or for Congress in this matter.

Mr. CULKIN. I withdraw the question, if I may, in this presence. I do not wish to embarrass the distinguished gentleman. I have great faith in his judgment on these matters. Permit me to advance another query: Under this present bill and under bills that have been passed heretofore by Congress, where the water users are unable to pay their rent, the service is discontinued by statute, is it not?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Under this law the Government advances the money and the water users are required to repay it to the reclamation fund. It is a special fund created by law in 1902 for that purpose. They are required to repay that fund all the cost of construction within 40 years, without interest. That money does not come out of the Federal Treasury.

Mr. CULKIN. And in some cases 99 years?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Oh, no. The longest term is 40 years.

Mr. CULKIN. There is one project——

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Let us not bother about one project. The general policy is to repay within 40 years, without interest. They are required to repay to that fund so much every year. For the last 3 or 4 years the water users have not been able to pay. They could not get anything for their produce, and they could not reimburse the Federal Treasury or the reclamation fund. We have passed several bills granting them a moratorium, but we do not at all cancel the debt. It simply puts it off. The Government holds a first-mortgage lien on every acre of that land and on the canals and reservoirs and dams and water rights and everything else. Every water user in the irrigation district has what amounts to a mortgage on his farm for the entire amount of the cost of the whole project. The Government required the water users to sign up a joint liability. Uncle Sam takes no chances on losing.

Mr. CULKIN. May I ask another question?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Certainly.

Mr. CULKIN. Is it not a fact that we are now overproducing and that these new projects prejudice the men who are already on these reclamation projects, dedicating their lives and their blood and sweat to them? In other words, is there not at present and has there not been for 2 or 3 years overproduction of the crops produced on those reclamation projects, such as onions, lettuce, and beets?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Well, the question the gentleman raises involves a long story. I could talk a week on this matter. These reclamation projects are out there a thousand miles from the markets. The water users' produce cannot stand the freight rates to compete with the farmers who are near to the market. They do not compete with them but to a very slight extent. A very large part of the money awarded to those projects by the Public Works Administration was to complete the construction of them to make them solvent and self-liquidating. The reclamation fund has not had sufficient money to finish some of the projects as they should be. The Uncompahgre project in my district was never completed, although it was started nearly 30 years ago. It has not had more than two thirds of the water that it needs. We have just within the past few days succeeded in inducing the Public Works Administration to authorize an appropriation for the construction of a reservoir so that they can catch the flood waters in April and May and use them to irrigate their lands in July and August. Wherever there is a reclamation project built on a stream and it must depend on just the natural flow of the stream for irrigation they have a flood in the spring when they do not need it, and they have little or no water in the summer and fall when they do need it. It is colossal stupidity to build a reclamation project without building a reservoir to supplement the flow during the latter part of the irrigating season.

The greater part of the money that I have been largely instrumental in getting for Colorado that I refer to is to build a dam and make a large reservoir and also to complete a 5-mile tunnel, both of which are absolutely necessary to put that project in a sufficiently practical condition to enable the water users to repay the Government for the cost of construction.

Mr. CULKIN. I am not quarreling with existing projects. I am not quarreling with the completion of present projects. What I am questioning here is the advisability of opening up new lands such as they are now on the Columbia River, with a potential acreage of 1,200,000, and in the Casper-Alcova project, which the gentleman says his committee, inferentially at least, rejected over a period of 4 or 5 years. May I ask the chairman this concrete question——

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Let me interrupt the gentleman. The Grand Coulee project in Oregon and the Columbia River project in Washington and others are mainly for the purpose of producing power.

Mr. CULKIN. I understand; but that is pure fiction. I assert before this Committee that that is pure fiction and that is a subterfuge. There is no place at Casper-Alcova, Wyo., to sell power, and there is no one to sell it to except coyotes and jack rabbits. That is a simon-pure and simple reclamation project. I know it, and I think in his heart the chairman knows it.

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. CULKIN. I yield if I have the floor.

Mr. HASTINGS. Why does not the gentleman stop his political sharpshooting until this particular question comes up before the Congress for consideration——

Mr. CULKIN. The gentleman is seeing red-eyed on this, and I am pressing the cause of the American farmer. No sharpshooting about it.

Mr. HASTINGS. Well, now, the gentleman has yielded to me.

Mr. CULKIN. Well, the gentleman should not make that statement.

Mr. HASTINGS. I will leave it in the RECORD.

Mr. CULKIN. I assume the gentleman will. It is untrue.

Mr. HASTINGS. I say to the gentleman he knows from press reports that it is expected an additional appropriation will be asked for to supplement the $3,300,000,000 that has been appropriated for the aid of unemployment.

Mr. CULKIN. I am not discussing——

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the gentleman wait a moment?

Mr. CULKIN. I did not yield to the gentleman to make a speech.

Mr. HASTINGS. The gentleman knows that this whole matter will come up then for consideration, and the gentleman knows that the committee which will be charged with the responsibility of making a report upon that appropriation will go into all those items to find out the expenditure of the $3,300,000,000, and the gentleman knows, of course, that this particular committee is not charged with the responsibility of making investigations of these allocations and how the money is to be spent.

The fault I am finding with the gentleman today is that he ought to wait until the proper time when the committee that is charged with the responsibility of making that investigation makes its report. That responsibility does not rest with this committee, but it rests with the committee which reports any additional appropriation. The committee should then have all of the facts so as to answer the gentleman's questions about how all this money is allocated and why it is allocated, and the reason for it. That is the point I am making.

Mr. CULKIN. Has the gentleman finished? The gentleman opened with an attack impugning my motives, which is absolutely unfair and untrue. I said a moment ago that I did not question the propriety of the projects which have been advocated by the committee today. I am in favor of the completion of all existing projects. What I am trying to find out, sir, is what the Government is doing on these new projects that are technically, under the rules of Congress, in charge of this committee?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words.

Mr. CULKIN. That is what I am trying to find out.

Mr. HASTINGS. The gentleman, if he knows anything, and, of course, he does——

Mr. CULKIN. I thank the gentleman for the concession.

Mr. HASTINGS. When the gentleman moved to strike out the last word he understood, of course, that this committee did not have jurisdiction over the expenditure of the $3,300,000,000.

And the gentleman knows from press reports that there is to be a request for an additional amount. The gentleman knows also that the committee which brings that bill to the House will be charged with the duty and responsibility of making an investigation as to how the $3,300,000,000 is to be spent.

Mr. CULKIN. If the gentleman will permit an interruption at this point——

Mr. HASTINGS. In just a minute I will yield.

Mr. CULKIN. The gentleman stated what it was for a moment ago.

Mr. HASTINGS. Yes; but I want the gentleman from New York to hear it again. The gentleman knows this committee has not been charged with making an investigation of the allocations from the $3,300,000,000 fund. Therefore, the gentleman knows this subcommittee does not have the detailed information regarding any of these projects that are to be provided for out of money allocated from the $3,300,000,000.

When the committee having this matter in charge seeks an additional appropriation, then will be the opportune time for the gentleman to make inquiry as to why these allocations were made, as to the cost of these projects that are to be provided for. But the gentleman now making inquiry of this committee, and others who have been so solicitous about the matter this morning, knows that another committee will be charged with the responsibility of securing this information and making a report to the House.

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent, in view of the phase the discussion has taken, that the gentleman's time be extended 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. CULKIN. Might I inquire of the gentleman—I thank him, of course, for the information—in whose possession is now technical knowledge on this subject?

Mr. HASTINGS. The gentleman made the statement that there had not been any investigation.

Mr. CULKIN. We do not need to go over the same ground again; we have been over it several times.

Mr. HASTINGS. The gentleman knows that——

Mr. CULKIN. The Casper-Alcova project.

Mr. HASTINGS. Yes. The gentleman knows the committee having this bill in charge is not charged with that responsibility. When these additional funds are asked for the committee that is charged with the responsibility will secure and report all the facts inquired about by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CULKIN. Can the gentleman tell me in words of one syllable, and briefly if he will—and I do not mean to lecture him, for I am always glad to hear him on the floor of the House—who in the House is in charge of the technical determination of the propriety of these projects?

Mr. HASTINGS. This subcommittee, let me repeat, is not charged with the responsibility of securing and reporting this information.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I may say to the gentleman from New York that the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation has charge of these irrigation matters.

Mr. CULKIN. Not intending, as suggested by the gentleman from Oklahoma to sharpshoot politically—that is the least of my intentions—I am in sympathy with the gentleman on the relief program; but will the subcommittee in charge of the Interior Department bill, or any committee of the House, have jurisdiction of the initiation of these projects, or is it to be solely at the command and under the direction of Mr. Mead, the Commissioner of Reclamation?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. It is not Mr. Mead; it is the Public Works Board.

Mr. GILCHRIST. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GILCHRIST: Page 49, line 5, after the word "maintenance", strike out "$37,200" and insert "30 cents."

Mr. GILCHRIST. Mr. Chairman, I know how hopeless it is to attempt to discuss this subject here today. I am very thankful to the distinguished chairman of the committee for the manner in which he has replied to the questions I propounded.

It now appears that in new reclamation projects there is to be about $200,000,000 expended by the Public Works Administration. I know but little of the Yuma project, but this appears to be the first place where an amendment of this nature may be offered; and if this one fails—as no doubt it will—I do not expect to offer a like amendment as against the other projects. But in order that it may be brought before the House, it seems to me that a time when we are asked to balance the Budget, a time when the wheat acreage is being cut down, when cotton is being plowed under, when in my State they are asking the farmers to reduce their acreage 20 percent, is no time to continue appropriating large sums of money for irrigation and reclamation projects of this character.

I do not care further to take the time of the House, and, recognizing how hopeless it is to try to defeat this kind of expenditure, I ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I may say to the gentleman from Iowa that he apparently loses sight of the fact that this reclamation fund is a special fund created by the act of Congress of June 17, 1902, setting apart what is known as a "reclamation fund" to be supplied from the sale of public lands, from royalties coming from oil on the public domain, and by several other sources in the Western States.

Never during its existence has the State of Iowa contributed one dollar to this fund. It is purely a fund of our own creation and replenishment. It comes from our country and from our resources. It is a part of our western birthright. It is nobody else's business. The money comes from lands located in our Western States. The fund is authorized by Congress for this express purpose. It is a revolving fund, and can only be expended for this purpose. We are trying desperately hard to upbuild the West out of our own resources, and we think it comes with ill grace for people from the older and richer States to be constantly throwing bricks at us.

The $37,200 allocated to the Yuma project is purely and solely for operating expenses, to keep the plant going; and I may add that on this project a great deal of power is developed from which revenue is derived. A certain percentage of this revenue over and above maintenance goes into this fund.

The discussion this afternoon is further predicated upon the assumption that we are dipping into the Federal Treasury; but we are not dipping into the Federal Treasury at all, with two exceptions. In 1910, I think it was, we borrowed $20,000,000 from the Federal Treasury. I think we have paid back about half of it. Subsequently, I think, we borrowed $5,000,000. But in the main this fund is entirely a revolving fund and is calculated to take care of all these reclamation projects and build up that western country. It has brought about one of the most marvelous developments in the history of our country. Millions of people have homes there. It has built a magnificent empire out of what formerly was a barren wilderness. We have added hundreds of millions of dollars to the wealth of our country. We are only asking for a fair and necessary opportunity to work out our own salvation. We are merely appealing for a square deal for the West.

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be allowed to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. CULKIN. Will the gentleman yield so that I may ask the chairman a brief question?

Mr. GILCHRIST. Yes; I yield.

Mr. CULKIN. Is it not a fact that the revenues that come from duties collected at the Port of New York belong just as much to the Port of New York as this money does to the States? In other words, are they not national funds? What is the distinction?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. There is no comparison between the tariff duties collected in New York and the settling of a thousand miles square of wild, barren, and worthless mountains and deserts, inhabited only by Indians and wild animals. I have lived out there ever since I was 12 years old. We took that wilderness that Uncle Sam owned, that was not only worthless but was a liability, and without receiving scarcely anything we have reclaimed it and made it habitable for 20 millions of people. The Government of the United States is receiving large revenues from us. All of the Eastern States are selling their manufactured products, automobiles, and everything else to our people, and we are making a great market for the products of the East, the North, and the South, and building up our own country with our own muscle, energy, heroic western spirit, grit, and determination. We are doing a great work that the history of our country will forever be proud of.

Mr. GILCHRIST. I suppose this is all taken out of my time.

Mr. Chairman, I can conclude my remarks in reference to this in 1 minute by saying that I know how they have made homes out there in the wilderness. I have been out there and have traveled over the territory that must be near to where the gentleman from Colorado lives. I have been in Oregon and I have seen all of those things. The fact is, as I understand it, that most of the money used in building these projects is loaned to them without interest to the Federal Government.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. No, sir. It comes out of our own reclamation fund.

Mr. GILCHRIST. And it is proposed, in addition to this, as has already been pointed out, to use $200,000,000 out of the Public Works Administration, which is public money.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes, sir; and my committee has nothing to do with it.

Mr. GILCHRIST. That money will be an appropriation by the Federal Government.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. This committee, I repeat and repeatedly reiterate, has nothing to do with it. We have not appropriated a dollar of that money. There is nothing in this bill about it.

Mr. GILCHRIST. I am calling attention to this point, that so long as it is the policy to curtail production, it is positively assinine, in my judgment, to appropriate $200,000,000 or the amount of money that is in this bill to produce further crops. Either one of those two things is wrong. I leave it to the gentleman and to the House to decide it.

Knowing how hopeless it would be to try to put this amendment through, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw it.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Giving information to settlers: For the purpose of giving information and advice to settlers on reclamation projects in the selection of lands, equipment, and livestock, the preparation of land for irrigation, the selection of crops, methods of irrigation and agricultural practice, and general farm management, the cost of which shall be charged to the general reclamation fund and shall not be charged as a part of the construction or operation and maintenance cost payable by the water users under the projects; not to exceed $10,000 of the unexpended balance of the appropriation for this purpose for the fiscal year 1934 is continued available for the same purpose for the fiscal year 1935.

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word in order to ask the chairman about the subsistence homesteads in connection with the bill under consideration. Under the National Recovery Act some $25,000,000 was provided for subsistence homestead projects. We are all aware that that sum has been expended. And I desire to know of this committee what appropriation will be made, since there is nothing in the bill for the continuance of this most worthy project.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I will say to the gentleman it is not necessary for this committee to handle that at all. The Public Works Administration is handling it. This does not come to us at all. It has not been presented to us. That is entirely a matter of the executive branch of our Government. It has never reached Congress yet. All of this public work is being handled by the Public Works Board. They have not come to Congress, and they have not come to us, and we do not know anything about it, excepting from the newspapers and statements of the executive officials of our Government. The gentleman can readily learn as much as we know about the activities of the Public Works Administration.

Mr. COLMER. Then I will ask the gentleman if he has any information as to what will be done by the Public Works, or this committee, or anyone else, for the furtherance of this project?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Really I do not know what is their policy.

Mr. RANDOLPH. May I answer the gentleman's question?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes; surely.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I believe that the President looks with favor on placing many more millions of dollars to be expended on subsistence homesteads throughout various sections of the country that have not received help from the first $25,000,000 set aside by the Public Works fund at the insistence of the President himself. The first 29 areas that were selected were in what were believed to be the worst stranded areas of the United States; areas that demanded immediate attention. I know it is the purpose of Dr. M. L. Wilson, who is the head of the Subsistence Homestead Division of the Department of the Interior, also of Mr. Ickes and his associates, and at the insistence of the President himself, to carry this program forward and to make it one of the real programs of the Roosevelt administration for the rehabilitation and well-being of the farmers and the stranded industrial, lumber, and coal workers who have been out of work.

Mr. COLMER. I thank the gentleman for this information. I was already aware of the President's views on the matter as well as those of the head of this Department, Dr. Wilson. My inquiry was rather directed to what was being done toward effectively putting those ideas into effect.

Mr. PATMAN. I move to strike the last two words and ask unanimous consent to speak out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

PUBLICITY INCOME-TAX RETURNS

Mr. PATMAN. The Ways and Means Committee of the House is now considering a new tax bill. I appeared before the committee a few days ago and suggested that a provision be included which will permit income-tax returns to be subject to public inspection. The amendment that I prepared is as follows:

That notwithstanding the provisions and limitations of any of the laws relating to internal-revenue taxes, refunds, credits, abatements, all income, war-profits, and excess-profits tax returns heretofore or hereafter made, upon which the tax has been determined by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, shall constitute the public records, and shall be open to examination and inspection. The Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe reasonable rules and regulations to carry out the purpose of this provision.

TURN ON THE LIGHT

I believe public funds should be collected and disbursed in a way that will permit them to be subject to public inspection. I do not think we would have had the large deficit in the Treasury which we have today had these income-tax returns been subject to public inspection.

Tax secrecy is a badge of fraud. Secrecy helps the tax evaders, tax dodgers, the dishonest, unscrupulous, and unpatriotic.

Mitchell would never have attempted his tax evasions by transfers of stocks to his wife, if he had known that his return would have been subject to public inspection.

3,000 DAYS—3,000 MILLIONS

Mellon would not have made the refunds amounting to 3,000 million dollars in 3,000 days to a few large corporations, himself, and his companies without the cloak of secrecy.

Morgan would have paid taxes the year that he launched a $2,500,000 yacht and collected $7,000,000 dollars in interest on bonds had his tax return not been shrouded with secrecy.

HAT-PASSING METHOD

Let us prevent this wholesale graft and corruption by turning on the light. All public funds should be collected and disbursed subject to public inspection in the same manner that funds are collected and disbursed for the benefit of cities, counties, and States. Massachusetts and Wisconsin permit publicity of income-tax returns. No harm can come to anyone by reason of such a provision. The Government's system of requiring secrecy of income-tax returns places the Government in its effort to collect revenue in almost the same position as a blind man passing around the hat. The blind man does not know who contributes nor how much. With the Government's system of collecting income taxes, the people do not know who pays taxes nor how much.

DISCOVERY 3 YEARS LATE

Congress is now patching up loopholes in our income tax laws that would have been discovered 3 years ago had it not been for secrecy. No doubt the Government has lost billions of dollars by reason of such secrecy.

A provision permitting publicity of income-tax returns will cause the Government to collect more revenue than almost any other measure that can be proposed at this time.

The Secretary of the Treasury will be permitted, under the proposed amendment, to prescribe reasonable rules and regulations to carry out the purposes of the amendment, and I suggest that if you are interested in such an amendment that you speak to the members of the Ways and Means Committee about it, because the committee, I understand, is seriously considering placing such a provision in the bill.

Mr. SEGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. Yes.

Mr. SEGER. Does the gentleman want to qualify his statement when he says "heretofore made"? Does the gentleman want to restrict it to a reasonable time?

Mr. PATMAN. That is all right, but I want all of them to be subject to public inspection, especially the refunds. I am not particular about the returns in the past being made public now, but I insist that all refunds should be included. In the past when one made an application for a refund there was no way in the world for such an application to be made subject to public inspection, and all of the refunds and credits and abatements have been granted, you might say, secretly, not subject to public inspection.

SECRETARY MELLON

The Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Mellon, in the 3,000 days of his administration, refunded in cash and credits and abatements more than 3,000 million dollars. I would not say that all of this was refunded illegally. I am sure it was not all refunded illegally, but I have very good reasons to believe that a large amount of it was illegally refunded, and I do not believe a condition like that should be allowed to exist—where a man who is Secretary of the Treasury is making large refunds to himself and to his own companies and other large corporations throughout the country and yet the papers in connection with such refund are secret.

As a Member of the Congress representing the two or three hundred thousand people in your district, you did not have the right to go down there and find out about it. You could read in the newspapers that he had given his company, perhaps, $1,000,000 tax refund, but you could not find out why to save your life. There was no way for you to find out, although you were representing the people of your district.

Mr. SEGER. What I was interested in was the gentleman's previous statement, and I wondered how far back the gentleman wanted to go in respect of such things.

Mr. PATMAN. I am willing to go back as far as this amendment will permit.

The SEGER. The gentleman would leave that to the discretion of the Treasury?

CAN NOW COLLECT LARGE AMOUNTS

Mr. PATMAN. Yes; but so far as refunds are concerned, I am anxious that they should be allowed to go back any length of time. The statute of limitations does not run against fraud, and I think the Government would collect a considerable sum of money any time these refunds and credits and abatements were made subject to public inspection, because much fraud would be disclosed.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, I have here a statement on veterans' legislation which I think is convincing as to what caused the sentiment against the veterans last year, which resulted in the passage of what is known as "the economy bill", or Public, No. 2, and I ask permission to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting the statement which I have referred to.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

SILLY, ALTHOUGH EFFECTIVE, PROPAGANDA AGAINST VETERANS

Mr. PATMAN. Veterans fell down on the job when it came to effectively answering untruthful, misleading, and illogical statements which were highly injurious to their cause and which could have been easily answered to the entire satisfaction of any reasonable-minded person. Such propaganda caused the enactment of the so-called "economy bill", or Public, No. 2, in March 1933.

One of these statements was: "World War veterans are receiving a per capita payment, based upon dead and wounded, of $2,668.66, as compared with an average of $53.80 for the other major powers of the World War." This statement was based upon a table that was presented by the Veterans' Administration, which was as follows:

Based upon the numbers reported as either dead or wounded, the annual expenditure of Great Britain, as a result of the World War, is $58 per man; of France, $51; and of the United States, $2,668.

Comparative statement of annual expenditures by United States and foreign countries for World War veterans and their dependents

	Men mobilized	Dead and wounded	This year's relief bill	Per capita based on men mobilized	Per capita based on dead and wounded
United States	4,757,240	322,497	[1] $860,635,000	$180.91	$2,668.66
Germany	13,000,000	6,111,862	298,690,000	22.98	48.87
France	8,410,000	5,623,000	286,722,000	34.09	50.99
Great Britain	6,600,000	3,000,000	174,802,060	26.49	58.27

[1] That portion of Veterans' Administration appropriations made applicable to World War veterans for fiscal year 1932, including $312,000,000 appropriated to adjusted-service certificate fund.

NOTE.—The data used for foreign countries are taken from article appearing in the New York Times, June 5, 1932, and the information seems to be reliable. The data for United States veterans are from official information of record in the Veterans' Administration.

This table was reproduced on large charts by the National Economy League and distributed all over the Nation. It presented information that was astounding to the uninformed.

FALLACIOUS THEORY AND HALF TRUTHS

The figures for Japan and Australia were not included. The reason is obvious. Hand-picked information was used. Anything that would place in an unfavorable light the World War veterans of the United States seems to have been desired and nothing more. Not only was a fallacious theory used, as I expect to demonstrate hereafter, but an effort was made to support it with half-truths, untruths, and incorrect statements.

FIGURES PADDED MORE THAN $400,000,000

In the comparison figures in the above table the year 1932 is used and the amount expended for World War veterans placed at $860,835,000. It is admitted by the Veterans' Administration that $310,000,000 of this amount represented an appropriation for the adjusted-service certificate fund. In other words, $310,000,000 were not given to veterans or paid to veterans but were loaned to veterans at interest. This amount should not be included in the amount expended for that year. In the total figures were also added $125,733,000 for insurance. The veterans themselves paid for this insurance, and this amount should not be used in a comparison table with other countries in which gratuitous benefits only are considered. After deducting these two items the amount expended by the Government for World War veterans in 1932 amounted to $425,635,000.

FIGURES FOR FOREIGN COUNTRIES WRONG

On the other hand, the amounts stated as expended by other countries for veterans' relief are not correct. For instance, many veterans and their dependents in other countries are taken care of under general laws for the aged, distressed, unemployed, orphans, and widows and not charged up to veterans' relief at all.

FALSE AND UNTRUE

After all, the veterans are now suffering because of a fallacious theory supported by untruthful and incorrect representations included in a widely advertised table.

ANALYSIS OF TABLE

Let us carry the statement and the argument it implies to their logical conclusion. The inference is left that we should pay our veterans in proportion to what the conquered nation, Germany, is paying her veterans or according to what the devastated country, France, is paying her veterans, and that the payment should be based upon the number of men mobilized or upon the dead and wounded of each nation. Is that a fair way to measure the generosity of a nation? Are the dead and wounded to pay the cost of a war? Or should the cost of a war be borne by the men mobilized? They are not the only ones to be benefited. The entire population of a nation receives the benefit. It has never been measured that way before. Every country on earth has always pursued the policy of paying her veterans of a war as much as she was able to pay them, according to the national wealth and national income of the nation. That is the only fair way of measuring a nation's generosity toward her defenders, by the ability of the nation to be generous.

Insurance premiums are based on the value of the property protected, not according to the value of the neighbors' uninsured property that was destroyed. After the War between the States the Southern States paid Confederate veterans very small pensions; they were not able to pay more. Should the Union soldiers have been told by their friends that according to the amount paid Confederate veterans they should only receive a much smaller sum?

The following table discloses the annual expenditures for World War veterans and their dependents, in relation to national wealth and national income, for various countries of the world:

Country	A	B
	Expenditures for World War veterans and their dependents	National wealth

[1] Average.
[2] The figures are more glaring when consideration is given to the fact that the national debt of the United States is smaller than the national debt of any other nation on earth.

FOREIGN COUNTRIES PAY VETERANS MORE THAN UNITED STATES

The data used were obtained from the Library of Congress. It will be noticed that foreign countries are paying their World War veterans three times as much as the United States, based on national wealth or on national income. When reductions are made in compliance with Public, No. 2, foreign countries will be paying such veterans six times as much as the United States, based on wealth and income. The veterans protected the wealth and thereby enabled the incomes to be earned. The table prepared by the Veterans' Administration indicates that the veterans were fighting the war for themselves and the dead and wounded should bear the entire cost of it.

No veteran should miss an opportunity to expose this falacious and foolish doctrine. It was the most dangerous and effective propaganda used by the National Economy League.

POPULATION AS BASIS

If population figures are used in order to compare the expenditures for World War veterans of various countries, it will be discovered that the annual expenditures per capita are as follows: Canada, $6.11; France, $6.66; Germany, $4.80; Great Britain, $3,95; Italy, $1.64; and the United States, $3.40. However, population should not be used as a basis for comparison, since all comparison figures should be based upon wealth and income, yet it is much fairer to use population than to use the number of men mobilized or the dead and wounded as a comparison.

The Clerk read as follows:

Hot Springs National Park, Ark.: For administration, protection, maintenance, and improvement, including not exceeding $700 for the maintenance, operation, and repair of motor-driven passenger-carrying vehicles for the use of the superintendent and employees in connection with general park work, $64,330.

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman of the subcommittee a question.

I notice in respect of all these national-park projects the appropriation has been cut down this year very materially.

The appropriation for the Hot Springs National Park is something like $10,000 under what it was last year for actual maintenance and exclusive of any physical improvements. While I am sure I understand it, I want the RECORD to reflect the true facts.

Is it a fact that this reduction is caused by the impounding of 25 percent of the fund by the President's order?

Mr. HASTINGS. That is correct; and the park is getting the same amount, taking that fact into consideration, they got last year.

Mr. GLOVER. There will be just as much for maintenance under this appropriation as they had before?

Mr. HASTINGS. The gentleman is correct.

The Clerk read as follows:

Cooperative vocational rehabilitation of persons disabled in industry: For carrying out the provisions of the act entitled "An act to provide for the promotion of vocational rehabilitation of persons disabled in industry or otherwise and their return to civil employment", approved June 2, 1920 (U.S.C., title 29, sec. 35), as amended by the act of June 5, 1924 (U.S.C., title 29, sec. 31), and the acts of June 9, 1930, and June 30, 1932 (U.S.C., Supp. VI, title 29, secs. 31–40), $822,750: Provided, That the minimum allotment to any State hereunder for the fiscal year 1935 shall be $7,500.

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and ask to proceed out of order.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. CARY). Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, when the House considers the bill pertaining to monetary matters tomorrow, Saturday, January 20, I will offer an amendment in lieu of section 10 of the bill. This amendment will place in a board of five members the duty to administer the fund of $2,000,000,000 which under the terms of the bill will be administered by the Secretary of the Treasury. Under the amendment the board will consist of the President, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Governor of the Federal Reserve Board, and two members to be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate.

The amendment which I expect to offer is as follows:

SEC. 10. (a) For the purpose of stabilizing the exchange value of the dollar, a board named the "Currency Equalization Board" is hereby established. Such board shall consist of the President, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Governor of the Federal Reserve Board, and two other members to be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate. The salary of each of the two members appointed by the President shall be $10,000 per annum. Hereafter in this act the Currency Equalization Board shall be designated as the "Board." The board shall act for the fund established in this section to deal in gold and foreign exchange and such other instruments of credit or security as the board may deem necessary to carry out the purposes of this section. An annual audit of such fund shall be made and a report thereof submitted to the President.

(b) To enable the board to carry out the provisions of this section, there is hereby appropriated, out of the receipts which are directed to be covered into the Treasury under section 7 hereof, the sum of $2,000,000,000, which sum when available shall be deposited with the Treasurer of the United States in a "stabilization fund" (hereinafter called the "fund") under the exclusive control of the board, whose decisions shall be final and not subject to review by any other officer of the United States. The fund shall be available for expenditure, under the direction of the board and in its discretion, for any purpose in connection with carrying out the provisions of this section, including the investment and reinvestment in direct obligations of the United States of any portions of the fund which the board may from time to time determine are not currently required for stabilizing the exchange value of the dollar. The proceeds of all sales and investments and all earnings and interest accruing under the operations of this section shall be paid into the fund and shall be available for the purposes of the fund.

(c) The board provided for in this act shall terminate on March 15, 1935, unless by law hereinafter enacted the life of such board shall be extended. Upon the termination of this board, a board shall continue to exist consisting of the President, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Governor of the Federal Reserve Board for the purpose of continuing as a liquidating agency for the orderly liquidation of such assets as are in the hands of the board on the date of the legal termination of the board created by this act. As such assets are liquidated, the proceeds from such assets shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the general fund.

(d) At such times as the President may determine, the President shall cause an audit to be made of the fund and a full report thereof shall be included in the next succeeding annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury.

The Clerk read as follows:

Appropriations available to the Federal Board for Vocational Education for salaries and expenses shall be available for expenses of attendance at meetings of educational associations and other organizations which in the discretion of the Board are necessary for the efficient discharge of its responsibilities.

Mr. JEFFERS. Mr. Chairman and ladies and gentlemen of the Committee, at this point I desire to call attention to the seriousness of the situation, as it now appears to me, regarding the educational training of our young people, especially with regard to vocational agriculture and vocational home economics training.

There is no appropriation of any money by the Federal Government which goes further, or which accomplishes more real and material beneficial results for our people, than the comparatively small amount of money which the Congress has heretofore appropriated for expenditure in all sections of the Nation for vocational agriculture and vocational home economics. These vocational schools all over the country have made it possible for the young men of the Nation, who will become the farm leaders of the future, to receive much constructive and practical training. It is useful work and will mean a great deal toward constructive leadership for the entire agriculture industry. This practical training is at this time fitting many young agriculturalists for their future responsibilities in connection with the successful carrying out of the great Nation-wide agricultural recovery program, and will, therefore, mean much, not only to those young people of our country who are receiving the benefit of this practical educational work, but will also mean a great deal to their communities, to the State, and to the general welfare of the Nation.

I believe that it is entirely right and proper to put into effect all possible economies in the operation of the business of this Government which can be accomplished without unduly crippling or actually destroying such beneficial governmental activity as this Federal aid for vocational agriculture and vocational home economies. I believe it is quite proper to effect, if possible, savings in the operating costs of the Federal Government by making any consolidations in the Government departments and bureaus which may be feasible and which consolidations will prevent overlapping and duplication of work, and also by abolishing any governmental activities or agencies which may be in operation at this time and which may not be rendering real beneficial services to our people; but I am firm in the opinion that it would not be real economy, taking into consideration the future welfare of the entire agricultural industry in this Nation, to reduce the appropriations which have heretofore been made by Congress for the carrying on of this most excellent vocational training.

Now, the 25-percent cut which has been proposed will go into effect March 4, as I understand it, unless we can do something about it here in the Congress before that time. I realize that this 25-percent cut which has been proposed by Executive order is in line with the general reduction of 25 percent which has been proposed for all Government expenditures, but this seems to me to be one activity which would, by virtue of its unusual and outstanding merit, be entitled to be considered as an exception to that general rule. I think that whatever steps as may be necessary should be taken in order that the 25-percent cut on this particular appropriation will not go into effect, because such a reduction in this already small and modest appropriation will so vitally affect the interests of agriculture.

Then, too, consider the fact that unless we can secure the passage of new legislation which will take the place of the George-Reed Act we will not be in position to secure the appropriation which we have been getting under the legislative authorization of the George-Reed Act during the last 5 years.

A bill which will take the place of the George-Reed Act has been introduced in the Senate, and, with other Members of the House who are also intensely interested in this matter, I have introduced a similar bill in the House. I sincerely hope that it will be possible to secure consideration of this legislation by the proper committees and that we can secure the passage of same, and that it will be found to be acceptable to the administration. I feel that nothing which can come before us is more vital to the recovery of the agricultural industry than this very matter, and I bespeak for it your earnest consideration. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

HOWARD UNIVERSITY

Salaries: For payment in full or in part of the salaries of the officers, professors, teachers, and other regular employees of the university, the balance to be paid from privately contributed funds, $405,000, of which sum not less than $2,200 shall be used for normal instruction.

Mr. DE PRIEST. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 85, line 18, after the word "instruction", insert a comma and the following: "and of which not less than $20,000 shall be used only for the school of engineering."

Mr. DE PRIEST. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to have the letter read which I send to the desk.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Cox). Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

On October 24, 1933, the board of trustees of Howard University passed the following resolution:

"In furtherance of the purpose of the board of trustees to continue and to reorganize instruction in engineering and architecture in the years 1934–36, on the improved basis expressed in the 10-year program of development, and in pursuance of which purpose the vote of the board of trustees, under date of April 28, 1933, was made, discontinuing the courses in engineering and architecture as at present organized in the college of applied science;

"That a special committee of the board be appointed to study all current and educational financial conditions bearing upon engineering and architecture and to recommend to this board at its January 1934 meeting the best possible organization and curricula of improved courses in architecture and engineering to succeed the courses as at present organized."

Attest:

EMMETT SCOTT, Secretary.

Mr. DE PRIEST. Mr. Chairman, Howard University is the only university in America of those of my group that teaches engineering. I understand from private sources that there is a movement on foot to abolish the engineering school in this university. The amendment that I have offered is to protect the engineering school, and I hope that it will be agreed to.

Mr. KVALE. It does not increase the appropriation?

Mr. DE PRIEST. Not at all.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I think the amendment will be very beneficial, and the committee accepts it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. Cox, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee had had under consideration the bill (H.R. 6951) making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them en gros. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 2 o'clock and 40 minutes p.m.) the House, under its order previously made, adjourned until tomorrow, Saturday, January 20, 1934, at 11 o'clock a.m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

299. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Navy, transmitting draft of a bill for the relief of the Richmond, Fredericksburg & Potomac Railroad Co.; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

300. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Navy, transmitting a proposed draft of bill to provide for the reimbursement of personnel of the Navy and Marine Corps for personal property lost, damaged, or destroyed as a result of the earthquake which occurred at Managua, Nicaragua, on March 31, 1931; to the Committee on Claims.

301. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting draft of proposed legislation to amend the act of Congress (Public, No. 543, 68th Cong.) approved March 3, 1925; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 2 of rule XIII,

Mr. TARVER: Committee on the Judiciary. H.R. 6974. A bill to provide for the regulation of prison industry and the appointment of a Prison Industrial Board, and for other purposes; without amendment (Rept. No. 296). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mrs. NORTON: Committee on the District of Columbia. S. 1659. An act to authorize an increase in the number of directors of the Washington Home for Foundlings; without amendment (Rept. No. 297). Referred to the House Calendar.

PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 3 of rule XXII, public bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

SATURDAY, JANUARY 20, 1934

The House met at 11 o'clock a.m.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Our blessed Lord God, we pray that the kingdom of Thy grace may invest our hearts, thus enabling us to overcome evil with good. Resolutely help us to bring Thy precepts to bear upon every wrong impulse of our natures. In all our contacts may we cultivate the divine power and beauty of goodness. O arm us against the downward pull and arouse us with the upward urge. Heavenly Father, keep us very conscious of the sweet joy that comes when the spirit of the Master hallows our industry. O Thou who didst consecrate the workshop by Thy presence and glorified labor by Thy example may we walk in Thy light—in Thy name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

RESIGNATIONS FROM COMMITTEES

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following resignations from committees:

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

MONETARY GOLD STOCK OF UNITED STATES

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Resolution 227.

House Resolution 227

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H.R. 6976, a bill to protect the currency of the United States, to provide for the better use of the monetary gold stock of the United States, and for other purposes, and all points of order against said bill or any provisions contained therein are hereby waived. After general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed 3 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and the amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion, except one motion to recommit.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes of my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANSLEY].

I now yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GREENWOOD].

Mr. GREENWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I believe this rule should be adopted as an expedient instrumentality to bring this very important bill before the House of Representatives at a time when it seems the necessity and emergency is so great. It has been requested by the President in order to add stability to our monetary system at this particularly difficult period.

Personally I have longed for this time to arrive when I might see the United States Government take charge of its monetary system. I believe now, under the leadership of the President and the events that have transpired since last March, the control of the Federal Reserve System and the control of our monetary system is going to be found in that agency, Congress and the executive departments of the United States, where it was intended it should be. The Constitution delegates authority to Congress to coin money and regulate the value thereof. There are no limitations upon this delegation of authority, and I think that the Congress of the United States has ample constitutional authority to grant this power to the President to carry out the provisions of this bill.

There have been some in the legislative body at the other end of the Capitol who have raised the issue about whether the President can take control and ask that all gold shall be turned into the Treasury of the United States without court action. I do not concur in the opinion of those gentlemen that the money, the circulation, the medium of exchange, that is set up for the business agencies of our Government and for the people to use in business transactions occupies the same position as real estate or other property.

I think there is ample authority under the Constitution for the Congress to take full control of our circulation of coin and of currency, without the authority of any court. I think it is fundamental that government should have the right to retire all issues of currency or coin, under the authority of the Constitution, and that there is no overreaching of authority because the court is not used, under the power of eminent domain. Money is a medium of exchange and an instrumentality of the whole people and no citizen has the proprietary right in money that he has in real estate and in other property, because of the public character of money.

Mr. BUSBY. Will the gentleman yield at this point?

Mr. GREENWOOD. I would rather not yield at this time. I will yield a little later.

I do not believe that gold or currency should be hoarded or held either by an individual or a bank——

Mr. BUSBY. Now, will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. GREENWOOD. No. I would prefer to make my statement first.

Mr. BUSBY. It is directly in connection with that statement.

Mr. GREENWOOD. The gentleman can obtain time and express his own views about that later.

I do not believe that money can be held, that is in restraint of trade or of commerce or ordinary activities for which money is intended. I think the Government has full control under those circumstances. The Government further has the duty of establishing a value of the dollar or of the circulation that will be stabilized and that will be certain. I think it is the ultimate intention of this bill to so stabilize the value of the dollar, stabilize it in the value of commodities, stabilize it in value of earning capacity of men, stabilize it in these contributions that are made through production and through labor, so that there can be some certainty as to the purchasing power or value of the dollar from time to time.

I cannot conceive any more dishonest dollar with reference to many of the classes of our citizenship than the one that has existed the last 3 or 4 years. It is inconceivable—in fact, it is unthinkable—that when there is to be a revaluation of the dollar this gold should still be retained by the private citizens or by the banks, that all this accrued value should go to the individual rather than to the whole people. So I am glad we have reached that time when the Government of the United States is to take charge of the monetary system in order to reach better stabilization of value and a greater certainty about the purchasing power of the dollar. [Applause.]

Furthermore, I believe that the $4,000,000,000 of gold as a metallic base upon which to issue credit and currency in this country is too small. For many years I have been converted to what at one time was called the quantitative theory of money. As a young man, even back in the days of William Jennings Bryan, I believed that the metallic base for our currency and our credit should be widened; that gold alone should not be the basis, but that both gold and silver could very well be used as the base for our credits and our circulation.

The chief objective toward which we should work to bring the country out of this depression is an increase in the volume of money so that the price of commodities may have a greater value as measured in dollars. Certainly for the last 3 or 4 years those who have possessed a fixed income or who have turned their property into gold certificates or into gold have had an accrued value to which they were not entitled. This is the reason why I think the dollar of the last 3 or 4 years has been somewhat of a dishonest dollar from the standpoint of the producer, the farmer, and the wage earners of America.

The time has arrived when the chief objective of this recovery program must be to restore purchasing power to the men and women who live on the farms and to the wage earners of America, that their wages and their produce shall have a greater value when measured in the dollars of the Nation. The objective the President has in mind will bring about this desirable result.

We have lived through a period where we have tried the gold standard. It was a narrow base upon which to issue currency and credits. We have learned the lesson that there is no sanctity in the gold standard. Not only have we experienced it but other nations also have experienced it. There is no sanctity in the gold standard that will carry us through a period such as we have so recently passed through; and, so far as I am concerned, I am willing to try what I have always believed and what I always hoped would happen, widening the metallic base on which our credits and our currency are established. I hope this revaluation of the dollar providing a widened base for the issuance of currency and credits will, later on, be augmented by the remonetization of silver upon the proper ratio between the two metals. Certainly the world situation has changed since the political issues of 30 years ago. We do not have the complications today with reference to the remonetization of silver that we had 30 years ago. We may safely move to the wider base that was advocated at that time. I recall very vividly the speech of the great commoner at the convention in Chicago, when he was arguing the theory, I believe, of this bill.

Mr. GREENWOOD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from New York yield me 2 additional minutes?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 additional minutes to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. GREENWOOD. In that speech, the address which won for him nomination for the Presidency, he said:

> You shall not bear down upon the brow of labor this crown of thorns, nor crucify mankind upon a cross of gold.

I am wondering what would have happened in this country had the lesson been learned at that time; that in narrowing the base of our currency by putting it on a gold standard which could be manipulated with ease by the money changers of this country they could bring about a money panic or a depression by using credits for speculative purposes, as they have done. And so I say I am glad we have in our President today the leadership of a man who has the vision and the courage to make a change in the monetary system.

If the old system has proved to be the thing that has brought us into this great Gethsemane, this valley of depression, its disastrous effects may be offset by widening the base through revaluing gold. I believe it can be and that when it is done our monetary system will be placed upon a sounder foundation, so I am willing and ready to follow the leadership of our President. Some people call it an experiment, but I am willing to believe it is the true solution of this situation, the solution which will bring us back to prosperity and to an equalization between different classes. This can be done by a revised monetary system.

I hope this rule will be adopted, and I trust the bill will be enacted, and I believe it will be. I am ready to follow the leadership of our President in this matter as one additional step in the recovery program. [Applause.]

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN].

WHO OWNS THE GOLD

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, the question has been raised of the right of the United States Government to take over the gold held by the Federal Reserve System.

The Federal Reserve System, which includes the 12 regional banks and their branches, has about $4,000,000,000 in gold. This gold formerly belonged to the people all over the Nation. The people were induced to deposit their gold in the banks and use paper currency instead for their moneyed transactions. The Federal Reserve System thereby became the means of collecting the gold in order that they might use it as a reservoir for credit. The Federal Reserve banks were never intended to make a profit. They have been doing business largely on the credit of the Nation. The member banks having invested only a very small amount in these institutions. In fact, the member banks have never had invested in all the Federal Reserve banks more than $160,000,000 at one time. With that small investment and the valuable asset, the credit of the Nation, these banks have done as much as $100,000,000,000 worth of business in a year. Without the use of the Government's credit, these banks could not have functioned as they did. But with the power to issue money—not redeemable by them, but redeemable by the United States Government—they have been enabled to do this enormous business. Each Federal Reserve note is a blanket mortgage on all the property of all the people in this Nation. It is also a mortgage on the incomes of all the people. This great right and privilege was conferred upon the Federal Reserve banks for the ostensible purpose of promoting the general welfare.

NO PROFIT INTENDED

It was never intended that these institutions should make a profit. The member banks that were required to take stock are permitted to receive a 6-percent dividend annually on the amount invested. The original Federal Reserve Act of 1913 contained the following provision:

SEC. 7. After all necessary expenses of a Federal Reserve bank have been paid or provided for, the stockholders shall be entitled to receive an annual dividend of 6 percent on the paid-in capital stock, which dividend shall be cumulative. After the aforesaid dividend claims have been fully met, all the net earnings shall be paid to the United States as a franchise tax, except that one half of such net earnings shall be paid into a surplus fund until it shall amount to 40 percent of the paid-in capital stock of such bank.

A CHISELLING AMENDMENT

After the earnings had almost reached 40 percent of the paid-in capital stock of each bank, there was an amendment that became law, March 3, 1919, which had been passed by Congress and approved by the President as follows:

After the aforesaid dividend claims have been fully met, the net earnings shall be paid to the United States as a franchise tax except that the whole of such net earnings, including those for the year ending December 31, 1918, shall be paid into a surplus fund until it shall amount to 100 percent of the subscribed capital stock of such bank, and that thereafter 10 percent of such net earnings shall be paid into the surplus. (Public, No. 329, 65th Cong.)

It will be noticed that this amendment gave each Federal Reserve bank the right to build up a surplus equal to 100 percent of its subscribed capital stock before having to pay a franchise tax to the Government.

NOTICE THE JOKER

Notice that the amendment permits the surplus fund to be the amount of the subscribed capital stock, not necessarily the paid-in capital stock. The banks have never paid in but one half of their subscribed capital stock, so this permitted the surplus fund to be increased to double the amount of the paid-in capital stock. It was another step in the direction of converting the Federal Reserve banks into profit-making institutions. There was doubtless a hope in the minds of some of these officials that this enormous surplus would some day be distributed back to the member banks.

CONGRESS SURRENDERS TO FEDERAL RESERVE

At the last session of Congress this part of section 7 of the Federal Reserve Act was further amended as follows:

After all necessary expenses of a Federal Reserve bank shall have been paid or provided for, the stockholders shall be entitled to receive an annual dividend of 6 percent on the paid-in capital stock, which dividend shall be cumulative. After the aforesaid dividend claims have been fully met, the net earnings shall be paid into the surplus fund of the Federal Reserve bank. (Public, No. 66, 73d Cong.)

This amendment completely changes the Federal Reserve System from the object of its original creation, as expressed by its proponents at the time of passage. In other words, it gives all the profits of the Federal Reserve banks to the Federal Reserve banks themselves and does not permit the Government to receive one penny in franchise tax for the use of the Government's credit.

I have wondered why there was an effort made at the last session of Congress to give all the net earnings to the Federal Reserve banks. I wonder if gold devaluation was contemplated by the proponents of this amendment, and if it was intended to force the Government to give all profits on the devalued gold to the Federal Reserve banks. Regardless of the intentions of the proponents of the amendment, the fact remains that it is the only straw that the big bankers of this country can rely upon as an argument in favor of the Federal Reserve banks retaining the gold in their possession.

HISTORY OF AMENDMENT

Permit me to trace the history of this amendment.

The Glass-Steagall bill, which contained this amendment giving the excess profits to the Federal Reserve banks, was before the House on the 22d day of May 1933. I introduced an amendment to strike out this section of the bill and made an argument in its behalf. The House agreed, and my amendment prevailed. Another body, however, passed the Glass-Steagall bill with the provision in it which permitted all excess profits to go to the surplus funds of the Federal Reserve banks. A free conference was asked and granted, and in the free conference committee the Senate conferees insisted upon a provision going in the bill that all net earnings should go to the banks instead of to the Government. The conference report put back the section that had been stricken out by the House, and that is the reason the law today denies the Government the excess earnings of these banks.

THE FLY IN THE OINTMENT

If this amendment had not passed, any earnings of the Federal Reserve banks would automatically go into the Treasury at the end of the year, except, of course, the 6 percent dividend on the paid-in capital stock and expenses of the Federal Reserve System. This would have resulted in all the increased price of the gold going into the Treasury at the end of the fiscal year. There could be no argument about that. But with this amendment, which to me is somewhat mysterious in that I am at a loss to know why it was insisted upon at that particular time, some people are claiming for the Federal Reserve banks that all the increased price of gold should go to them.

GET GOLD WITHOUT LAWSUIT OR DELAY

There is one sure way that the profit on gold question can be settled. There is no reason why we should run any risk of tying this valuable legislation up in the courts until its usefulness has been impaired or destroyed. There is a way of handling this question that will cause the profit on this gold to go to the Government and give the Federal Reserve banks no ground at all for a contention that the gold or the profits should belong to them.

Section 4 of the original Federal Reserve Act provided that each Federal Reserve bank shall have power:

Second, to have succession for a period of 20 years from its organization unless it is sooner dissolved by an act of Congress or unless its franchise becomes forfeited by some violation of law.

This section was amended in 1927 to read as follows:

Second, to have succession, after the approval of this act, until dissolved by act of Congress or until forfeiture of franchise by violation of law.

GOVERNMENT SHOULD TAKE OVER FEDERAL RESERVE SYSTEM

That is the present law. Therefore the Congress of the United States has a right to dissolve the Federal Reserve banks with or without cause. Certainly no one can contend that they have perpetual charters. The dissolution can be brought about by the Government paying the member banks of the Federal Reserve System the amount of money that they have invested as capital stock, which will not exceed $160,000,000. When these banks are paid the $160,000,000 the Government can take them over and operate them as it may desire, in compliance with a part of section 7 of the original Federal Reserve Act, which has never been amended and which reads as follows:

Should a Federal Reserve bank be dissolved or go into liquidation, any surplus remaining, after the payment of all debts, dividend requirements as hereinbefore provided, and the par value of the stock, shall be paid to and become the property of the United States and shall be similarly applied.

This provision also expresses an intent by Congress at the time the law was passed that all profits should go to the Treasury of the United States.

It would certainly be ridiculous for Congress to allow a private banking corporation that is owned exclusively by banks to have all the privileges that the Federal Reserve banks are entitled to and not be required to pay a franchise tax; not be required to pay a penny's interest for use of the Government's credit; and not even be required to pay Federal, State, or local taxes, except the small amount that they have to pay upon the real estate they own.

COORDINATE ACTIVITIES WITH RECONSTRUCTION FINANCE CORPORATION

There is a necessity for the Government to own the Federal Reserve banks at this time. When they are taken over their activities should be coordinated with the activities of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. This system should be used for the purpose of extending the Nation's credit to all banks—State and National—and to industry. This gap must be bridged in some way or manner, and we will never have a better opportunity than now, by the Government taking over the Federal Reserve banking system.

The Federal Reserve Bank of New York practically controls the entire System. J. P. Morgan has used this System to quite a great advantage, as I have pointed out in the past. He certainly had the good will of some of the directors of Federal Reserve banks, and they were certainly anxious to accommodate him because he had them on his preferred list and had favored them in a very substantial way.

UNHOLY ALLIANCE

Considering the unholy alliance that has been existing between the big, greedy, selfish, moneyed interests of this country and the Federal Reserve System, the abuse of the Government's credit, the extension of our credit for the use of foreigners, foreign countries, and international bankers and the exposure of the unsavory methods used by the biggest bankers of our Nation, who were permitted to further their interests through the Federal Reserve System, I think that we should bring this system as a private institution to an end and let the people's credit be used in the interest of the people and not in the interest of a few private bankers.

MAY ISSUE $10,000,000,000 MONEY ON GOLD PROFIT

If the dollar is devalued 50 percent, or a 25.8 grains of gold dollar is cut in two and a dollar hereafter to be 12.9 grains of gold, the Government will profit $4,000,000,000. That is, if we do not let the Federal Reserve banks have this profit, and we certainly should not. This $4,000,000,000 can be used as a basis of the issuance of $10,000,000,000 in currency without reducing the gold reserve less than 40 percent. We certainly know many things that we can do with this $4,000,000,000. We know it can be used to a better advantage than to give it to the Federal Reserve Banking System.

HEADS, I WIN—TAILS, YOU LOSE

It was contemplated by the framers of the Federal Reserve Act that the Federal Reserve System or the Federal Reserve banks should pay a small compensation for the use of Government credit, and it was written into section 16 of the Federal Reserve Act that when the Federal Reserve notes were delivered by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing to a private bank, a Federal Reserve bank, the bank should pay to the Treasury of the United States such an interest charge as may be assessed by the Federal Reserve Board. The Federal Reserve Board set a zero rate, no interest at all, although the law is mandatory, upon the theory that when the earnings of the Federal Reserve banks came in at the end of the year, and when the operating expenses of the banks had been paid and 6 percent dividends paid on paid-in capital stock, the surplus would go into the Treasury of the United States, and therefore the initial interest rate should not be required, since the surplus would go into the Treasury.

You can quickly see the position Congress has put the Government in. These banks are not charged an interest rate on the Federal Reserve notes that are guaranteed by the Government in compliance with section 16 of the act, because the profits go into the Treasury and there is no use requiring an interest charge on the notes when issued. Then the law is changed so that all profits will go to the surplus fund of the Federal Reserve banks. The Government is left out in the cold so far as the original intentions of the act are concerned and so far as the Government getting anything for the use of its credit is concerned.

It is time the Members of Congress give a little attention to a private business that is doing from fifty to one hundred billion dollars' worth of business a year on Government credit. These banks have a franchise worth billions of dollars if they are unmolested. In the hands of the large greedy bankers it is the world's greatest racket. Why not use these great powers that come from the people in the interest of the people? It is the people's property that is being used as security by these banks.

ANTI-GOLD-HOARDING ORDER

All the laws and regulations that have been passed and issued the last year requiring people to turn in their gold were complied with by turning the gold over to the banks and the banks turning it over to the Federal Reserve banks. I had knowledge of gold that was delivered to the Treasury that was in turn delivered to the Federal Reserve banks. I protested to the Secretary of the Treasury. I insisted that this gold should be retained by the Treasury, that it could be used as a basis for the issuance of two and one-half dollars to every one dollar of gold. The Treasury continued to deliver this gold to the Federal Reserve banks, notwithstanding my protest, and it is now insisted that such banks own this gold and all profits from revaluation of it should go to them. It is a silly contention.

RULE AND BILL

I expect to vote for this rule and vote for the bill.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MAY].

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, after having voted last week for the rule in connection with the independent offices appropriation bill, I have no hesitation whatever in saying that I can very gladly vote for this rule. I am 100 percent in favor of this bill and in favor of the rule, which, to my mind, under the circumstances which exist today, is ample time for debate, although the questions involved are of extreme moment and of vital importance. Sometimes the question of time is the essence of the situation, and this is one of the times when it is of great necessity that this measure be expedited through the House.

The Constitution of the United States provides that Congress alone shall have the power to coin money and regulate the value thereof. Under the not only implied but literal construction of this clause of the Constitution, the Congress has power to do the very things it is doing in this legislation.

Just about 100 years ago today the Bank of the United States had, concerning the money situation of this country, the same control and the same disposition of the power of money that the Federal Reserve banks, the individual banks, and the other banking institutions of this country have today. There was never a reason why gold as a metal should have been used as a circulating medium. There is less reason today that it should be so used than ever before.

I may say here that as a Member of this House I am a bimetallist. I believe in a broad base for the currency of this country, and I believe it not only should consist of a gold base but a bimetallic base of both gold and silver at a proper ratio. [Applause.] I may be pardoned for my statement here this morning that I have been blind enough, if you call it that, and I have been liberal enough to be for the past 30 years a great admirer and almost a worshiper of the teachings of that matchless statesman, William J. Bryan, whose policies if enacted into law 30 years ago, we would not today be in economic despair.

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE].

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, my first inclination was to vote for this bill for the reason attributed to Napoleon, who is averred to have said that it is sometimes better to do the wrong thing than to do nothing. Anxious as I was, and am, to acquaint the leaders in our industrial life with what they might expect to be the buying power of money upon the execution of a contract, the indispensable thing to a return of prosperity, I had hoped and at first blush thought this measure would conduce to that end; but upon analysis of it and upon such study and reflection as the brief time since the President sent his message has permitted, I have come to the conclusion that this measure in that respect would do more harm than good, and that we would be but jumping out of the frying pan into the fire. This removed any obstacle in the way of my submitting to the House considerations that might warrant the Members in voting against the bill and might acquaint the country, as far as that may be done through the columns of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, with the other side of the case.

The bill contains three major proposals and attention might well be concentrated upon them, the rest of the bill being chiefly matter of machinery. These proposals are not interdependent, save as they are part of a general monetary scheme, but they have been put into one bill and we are expected to take it all or none.

The first I would bring to your attention is the matter of the devaluation of the dollar. I am ready to admit that we are off the gold standard, that we shall be off the gold standard for a long time, and that we are not here called upon to devote attention to the problem of when this should take place or will take place. Admitting, therefore, that the dollar had been devalued, the vital thing was to know at what point a new valuation should be placed.

The President might have set a figure, and in so doing he would have allayed the fears of the business world, and those who compose it might at once have resumed the making of contracts and the wheels of factories now still might have been set aturning. Men now idle might have earned an honest livelihood. The dole under a camouflage might have been speedily suspended. Confidence would have been restored to the hearts of the people of the land; business would have been resumed; prosperity would have been approached. The President has seen fit to leave us still in doubt. He recommends that we give him authority now to fix the value of the dollar at anywhere between 50 and 60 percent of its nominal value. Sixty is 20 percent larger than 50, and there still remains a margin of 20 percent of uncertainty, sufficient to deter any prudent man from entering into engagements. He has known all along it might be somewhere from 50 to 66⅔. This changes his uncertainties only by removing 6⅔ percent. Therefore, in that respect the proposal goes no long way to encourage confidence.

Next, I would refer to the second of the important proposals, that relating to a stabilization fund.

Individually I have no objection to raise to a stabilization fund. That experiment has now been tried in England for many months and has worked admirably. It has served the purposes of Great Britain and I know of no reason why a similar fund might not here accomplish the same result; but the method contemplated threatens dangers so great as in the end to offset all the benefits that might be secured from the fund. One reason is that it turns the control of money in this country over to one man—the Secretary of the Treasury. We are getting many lessons these days as to the loss and gain from one-man power. The greater part of the continent of Europe has accepted the political theory that the best government is that which is restricted to one man. Italy, Germany—I must not take the time to enumerate the countries of Europe that have deserted the idea of a republican form of government. As with ourselves, they had been told that the World War meant the end of one-man power. Yet now these nations one after another have discarded democracy, and here, in the very bosom of our own country, its capital, comes along a proposal based upon the theory that one man, uncontrolled save by the President, acting in secret, not required to divulge either what he does or why he did it, shall to the extent of two thousand million dollars be entrusted with the greatest power that can be given to any human being in the land—the power of the purse. That this man, the Secretary of the Treasury, would undoubtedly work in harmony with the President, and if derelict would be dismissed, does not affect the principle involved, that of commanding the combined judgment of a few or many men, an essential feature of the republican form of government. If we are to have the benefits of united wisdom and all its safeguards, surely this power should be entrusted to a board.

Surely, too, the granting of this power in a period of emergency ought to be for a limited period, in order that when the emergency has passed Congress may be compelled to say whether the policy is to have permanence.

So, because of the dangers connected with this uncontrolled and unlimited delegation of power, I protest.

Furthermore, I protest because that power is taken away from an agency created some 20 years ago that has rendered the country great service; that perhaps made it possible for us to help win the war—the Federal Reserve Board. That Board was created on the theory it was not wise to put the power of managing the currency in the hands of one man, particularly one man exposed to political influences. We are all actuated by a mixture of motives. Let us confess it frankly. We are Republicans and Democrats here, and we cannot wholly exclude that consideration from our judgments; but it was the theory of those 20 years ago that the prudent thing to do was to put the regulation of the currency into the hands of a board on which there should be representation of both parties, a board with terms of office of such length and methods of appointment of such a shape that they would not be controlled by any party consideration; and in all the 20 years I have never heard a man allege that any action of the Federal Reserve Board has been taken to advance the interests of any section or any party. Now members of that Board have testified within 48 hours that this proposal will deprive them of the most important part of their power. They would become nothing more than the overseers of the machinery of the banking system of the country.

In the time of the World War, as I say, exercising their power to manage the currency, they did inestimable good. I believe they should be continued with that power. I believe that to take it away and put it in the hands of one man is dangerous in the extreme, and, of itself, would warrant a vote against this bill.

But to me the third of the important proposals is even more vital. It is the proposal that without just compensation we shall deprive part of the citizens of this country of a huge amount of property, by compelling them to turn it over to the Government of the United States. The President expects that through this transaction the Treasury will be richer by from thirty-four hundred to four thousand million dollars, according as the dollar is devalued by 40 or by 50 percent. You cannot make something out of nothing. This value will not come down from the skies. It will be taken away from somebody. From whom will it be taken? It will be taken from the Federal Reserve banks. Who own these banks? The member banks, as they are called, the national and State banks that are stockholders. Is it their property? Literally, yes, but in reality, no, for it is money that has been entrusted to them by millions of depositors. More than nine tenths of these depositors have balances of less than $2,500. Furthermore, no small part of the large accounts are those of insurance companies, educational and charitable institutions, and others who in the aggregate are entrusted with the use of millions on millions of dollars for the benefit of the masses of our people. Once again you are filching from the forgotten man.

It is argued that we may with a clear conscience take this property from those who in effect hold it in trust—the Federal Reserve banks, because, as Eugene R. Black, Governor of the Federal Reserve Board, says:

> This enhanced value of the System's gold has resulted from no work or investment or act or effort on the part of the System, but entirely from a governmental policy * * * and should go to the Government.

This may be stoutly contested. The rise in the buying power of gold is a corollary of the world-wide fall in prices due to the depression. The value in exchange within the borders of any one country may be temporarily affected by governmental policy, but unless that policy is adopted by many nations the intrinsic value of the metal will be determined by the operation of supply and demand in open markets. Within the borders of our own country governmental policy has already changed, and with the help of this bill may further change, the number of pieces of paper that may be held the equivalent of an ounce of gold. But as the world-wide value of gold in exchange has not changed and seems unlikely to change importantly, the change has been and will be not in the value of gold but in the value of the corresponding pieces of paper as measured by what they will buy. In fact, the avowed purpose of the administration is to make these pieces of paper cheaper; or, in other words, to raise the prices of commodities. To argue that this process has brought profit to the trustees for the depositors in our banks is of doubtful validity. After this process has reached its end the gold is to buy no more goods than before, so that there will have been no real profit. The commandeering of the gold on the proposed basis, therefore, will deprive a substantial part of our citizens—more than half of them, in fact—of one half of certain buying power they now possess. Whether or not they earned it is irrelevant. Whether or not it came to them through the chances of economic change, certain it is that economic change will continue, and that with the revival of industrial and other activities sure to come gains of this sort will be reduced or taken away by rise in the prices of commodities. Half of their gold taken, the thrifty part of the people—much the greater part—will then watch the remaining half of their savings, now indirectly invested in gold, gradually dwindle in buying power as prices rise.

It is frankly stated that the purpose is to enrich the Federal Government, to put in its hands that much more of wealth, which it may use, part of it in a designated fashion, the rest of it undesignated, but adding to the opportunity of the Government to spend money. At least $1,400,000,000 more is to be given into the hands of the administration to use as it sees fit, under the unlimited powers which we have granted to the President.

Now, sir, this taking introduces a further uncertain element.

At the time the repudiation bill was before the House last May I was one of those who cautioned the House of the grave danger of its unconstitutionality.

Let me recall that on a Wednesday a New York court held that the gold clause in contracts could be superseded by legislation, on a Thursday the news reached Washington, on a Friday the matter was considered by the administration and a bill was introduced here, on Saturday the bill was referred to a committee, on Monday the committee reported it and the House acted.

The basis of that action was a decision by an English court. I shall insert the American decision in the RECORD if, sir, I may have permission to revise and extend my remarks and incorporate certain judicial decisions.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. ROGERS of New Hampshire). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. LUCE. The important part of the decision is all in the next to the last sentence, but in order that there can be no question on that point, I insert the whole decision:

IRVING TRUST CO. v. HAZELWOOD

SUPREME COURT, SPECIAL TERM,
New York County, May 24, 1933.

Justice INGRAHAM:

This is a motion by the trustees under a trust mortgage made by the Libby's Hotel Corporation for construction of the provisions of the mortgage and for direction to the trustees to satisfy said mortgage upon receiving payment in full of the amount due them in funds other than gold coin. The obligation of the mortgagor provides that: "Libby's Hotel Corporation * * * will pay to bearer or to the registered holder hereof * * * dollars, in gold coin of the United States of America of not less than the present standard of weight and fineness as now fixed by law (notwithstanding any law which may now or hereafter make anything else legal tender for the payment of debts) * * *", and the coupons attached to the bonds contain a similar provision. In August 1929 the mortgaged property was condemned by the city of New York, and as a result of condemnation proceedings an award of $2,850,000, with interest thereon, has been affirmed by the Court of Appeals. The city is expected to make payment of the award during the current week. Such payment will not be made in gold coin, and the trustees accordingly seek instructions of the court. The attorneys for approximately 96 percent of the bondholders, on behalf of their clients, have presented an affidavit consenting that payment be made in current funds instead of gold coin. By Presidential proclamation all gold coin and gold certificates have been withdrawn from circulation. Upon surrender of gold coin or certificates the holder has received other currency of equal coin value. The case of Bronson v. Rodes (74 U.S. 229; 19 L.Ed. 141) is not in point. Different circumstances there prevailed. Two varieties of money were in general circulation—the gold dollar and the paper dollar. The latter had a much depreciated value. At the present time there is but one lawful medium of exchange, and this has the same coin value as gold of equal amount. The case of In re Societe Intercommunale Belge d'Electricite-Feist v. The Company, decided by the Court of Appeals of England in March of this year and reported in the Times Law Reports (p. 344), decides the question involved here. I accordingly instruct the trustees to accept current funds and upon payment of the amount due to satisfy the mortgage. Order signed.

Mark you, the American action was based wholly on the decision of a British lower court. Since that time the question has been submitted to the highest judicial body in England, the House of Lords, and that body has reversed the decision of the lower court. By reason of its supreme importance I insert that decision, as follows:

HOUSE OF LORDS,
Friday, December 15, 1933.

Feist, appellant, and Societe Intercommunale Belge d'Electricite, respondents.

Lords present: Lord Atkin, Lord Tomlin, Lord Russell of Killowen, Lord Wright.

(From the shorthand notes of Marten Meredith & Co., 8 New Court, and Cherer & Co., 2 New Court, Carey Street, W.C. 2.)

Sir William A. Jowitt, K.C., Mr. Lionel L. Cohen, K.C., and Mr. Cyril Radcliffe (instructed by Messrs. Allen & Overy, 3 Finch Lane, Threadneedle Street, E.C. 3) appeared as counsel for the appellant.

Mr. Gavin T. Simonds, K.C., and Mr. H. S. G. Buckmaster (instructed by Messrs. Stephenson, Harwood & Tatham, 16 Old Broad Street, E.C. 2) appeared as counsel for the respondents.

JUDGMENT

Lord ATKIN. My lords, I have had the opportunity of reading the opinion which is about to be delivered by my noble and learned friend Lord Russell of Killowen, and I agree with it and desire to adopt it. I wish to say also that my noble and learned friend Lord Warrington, of Clyffe, agrees with it.

Lord TOMLIN. My lords, I also have had the opportunity of reading the opinion which is about to be delivered by my noble and learned friend Lord Russell of Killowen, and I concur in it in all respects.

Lord RUSSSELL OF KILLOWEN. My lords, the point for decision in this case is one which primarily depends upon the true construction of the contract between the parties, the dispute being as to the way in which the obligations of the respondents as to principal and interest under a certain bond issued by them in the month of September 1928 are properly dischargeable. The difficulty arises from the presence in the bond of what is sometimes known as "a gold clause", and from the particular phraseology which it has assumed.

The respondents are a limited company incorporated under the laws of Belgium, with their head office in Brussels. They issued a series of bonds of various denominations which were offered for sale by M. Samuel & Co., Ltd., on September 25, 1928. The bonds are (except as to the principal amount secured thereby) identical in form.

The bond, which is the subject of the present proceedings, is couched as to its operative part in the following language: 1. "Société Intercommunale Belge d'Electricité (Société Anonyme), a corporation organized and existing under the laws of Belgium (hereinafter called 'the company'), for value received will, on the 1st day of September, 1963, or on such earlier day as the principal moneys hereby secured become payable in accordance with the conditions endorsed hereon, pay to the bearer at the registered office of M. Samuel & Co., Ltd. (hereinafter called 'the bankers'), in London, England, the fiscal agent of the company (or at the principal office of any successor fiscal agent) on presentation of this bond the sum of £100 in sterling in gold coin of the United Kingdom of or equal to the standard of weight and fineness existing on September 1, 1928. 2. The company will, during the continuance of this security, pay at the registered office of the bankers (or at the principal office of any successor fiscal agent), interest thereon at the rate of 5½ percent per annum in sterling in gold coin of the United Kingdom of or equal to the standard of weight and fineness existing on September 1, 1928, by equal half-yearly payments on every March 1 and September 1 in accordance with the coupons annexed hereto. 3. The principal of and interest on this bond are payable without deduction or diminution for any taxes, assessments, charges, or duties of any kind whatsoever—past, present, or future—that may be levied or imposed by the Kingdom of Belgium, or by any province, commune, municipality, or other taxing authority therein or thereof. 4. This bond is one of an authorized issue of bonds of the company of an aggregate principal amount not exceeding £500,000 in sterling in gold coin of the United Kingdom at any one time outstanding. 5. This bond is issued subject to and with the benefit of the conditions endorsed hereon, which are to be deemed part of it."

The conditions referred to in clause 5 are 20 in number. I shall refer to the relevant ones. No. 1 provides for a sinking fund. No. 2 enables the company to redeem bonds on any interest payment date beginning with September 1, 1933. No. 4 provides for increasing the amount of the payments under the bonds to meet the case of charges imposed by Belgian authorities which the company may not legally assume and pay. No. 6 runs thus: "The bonds of this issue shall constitute and they and each of them hereby are declared to be the direct and unconditional liability and obligations of the company in sterling in gold coin of the United Kingdom in accordance with the provisions of the bonds and these conditions." No. 16 (c) provides that in case default shall be made as there mentioned then "the company upon the demand of the bankers will pay to the bankers for the benefit of the holders of the bonds and coupons then outstanding in sterling in gold coin of the United Kingdom of or equal to the standard of weight and fineness existing on September 1, 1928, the whole amount which then shall have become due and payable on all such bonds and coupons then outstanding for interest or principal or both as the case may be." No. 18 provides that the bond shall be construed and the rights of the parties regulated according to the law of England and as a contract made and according to the terms thereof to be performed in England.

The coupons which are referred to in clause 2 of the bond, and in accordance with which the interest is to be paid, are each described on the front thereof as a coupon for £2 15s. 0d., being half-year's interest due on the particular date and "payable in accordance with the conditions endorsed hereon" at a place specified, less British income tax. The conditions endorsed on the coupons are in the following terms: "For £2 15s. 0d. in sterling in gold coin of the United Kingdom, of or equal to the standard of weight and fineness existing on the 1st day of September 1928, without deduction or diminution for any taxes, assessments, charges, or duties of any kind whatsoever, past, present, or future, that may be levied or imposed by the Kingdom of Belgium or by any province, commune, municipality, or other taxing authority therein or thereof."

I have cited to your lordships the relevant contractual provisions of the bond; but upon the document itself are to be found certain figures and words of description to which attention must be called. The letter press on the front of the document is enclosed in an ornamental rectangular border and in each of the two top corners are to be found the symbol and figures "£100." Inside the border and above clause 1 of the bond are the following words, figures, and symbols: "Thirty-five-year sinking fund 5½-percent sterling bond. Due September 1, 1963. Part of a total of £500,000 bonds offered for sale on September 25, 1928. Issued in bonds 50 of £1,000 each, numbered 3301 to 3350, inclusive. Issued in Bonds 300 of £500 each, numbered 3001 to 3300, inclusive. Issued in bonds 3,000 of £100 each, numbered 1 to 3000, inclusive. Bond for £100." I mention these details because in the courts below, upon the question of construction, some reliance was placed upon the fact that they were to be found inscribed upon the face of the document. It must, however, be borne in mind that they form no part of the contractual provisions of the bond; they merely purport to be descriptive of the bonds. If upon a consideration of the contractual provisions those provisions are open to more than one construction, descriptive words appearing elsewhere in the document may well assist in deciding which of the alternative constructions represents the intention of the parties; indeed, they may be decisive; but if the contractual provisions reveal only one construction, outside descriptive words will not be competent to alter that construction. If they cannot be reconciled with it, they become misdescriptive.

The question between the parties can now be stated. The company claim, and it has so been decided in both courts below, that they are entitled to satisfy the principal moneys and interest secured by the bond by tendering whatever might at the due date of payment be good legal tender for the nominal amount of the bond or coupon, as the case may be. It is obvious that this decision deprives of all effect the words which occur in clauses 1 and 2 of the bond, namely, "in gold coin of the United Kingdom of or equal to the standard of weight and fineness existing on September 1, 1928." These words (which merely for convenience I will call the "gold clause") need in this view never have been inserted at all.

The bondholder, on the other hand, contends that they were inserted for a specific purpose, namely, to protect the lender against any depreciation of sterling in terms of gold and that the gold clause, with its reference to gold coin of a defined standard of weight and fineness, is a clause which deals, not with the method in which a debt of fixed unvarying amount is to be discharged but with the fixing of the amount of the debt to be discharged.

Alternatively the bondholder says that if the bond is to be construed as a contract to pay in gold coins of the United Kingdom of the specified standard of weight and fineness, then he would, on breach, be entitled to equivalent damages.

Mr. Justice Farwell thought the question of construction a difficult one, but he came to the conclusion that the contract was to pay £100 and interest at 5½ percent as fixed sums, notwithstanding that such a condition involved giving no effect to the gold clause; and to pay those fixed sums by one particular form of legal tender and none other. He held that such a contract was not illegal, but that the respondents were, notwithstanding it, entitled to pay the fixed sums in any other form of legal tender. He made a declaration accordingly.

The master of the rolls, in effect, I think, was of opinion that upon its true construction the contract was a contract to pay £100 in a manner prescribed by English law, and was not a contract to pay a sum of money to be ascertained by calculation on the basis of a specified standard of gold.

Lord Justice Lawrence, after much fluctuation of opinion, came to the conclusion that the gold clause did not measure the liability, but indicated the mode in which a liability of fixed amount was to be discharged; and he held that an agreement to discharge a debt by one form of legal tender could not abrogate the enactment of the legislature that the debt could be discharged by other forms of legal tender.

Lord Justice Romer took the same view as to construction, namely, that the contract was to pay sums of fixed amounts, but to pay them only "in a particular form of currency, namely, the gold currency as it existed on September 1, 1928, to the exclusion * * * of all other forms of currency." Such a contract he held to be illegal under section 6 of the Coinage Act of 1870, with the result not that the whole contract was unenforceable but that the words which created the illegality must be treated as excluded.

My lords, I share the view of Mr. Justice A. Farwell and Lord Justice Lawrence that the question of construction is a difficult one, but after careful consideration of all the contractual provisions of the bond I have come to the conclusion that we should give to the gold clause the meaning and effect for which the bondholder primarily contends.

The courts below, in construing the bond, have started with the assumption that the bond must be, as is stated on its face, a bond for £100; they then construe the words of the gold clause literally and hold that its sole intention is to obtain payment in one particular form of tender only, and that that intention must be defeated by the operation of the law.

For myself, I approach the question of construction in a different way.

I consider first the state of affairs existing at the date of the bond. The gold standard act, 1925, had exempted the Bank of England from obligation to pay its own notes in legal coin but had provided that such notes should not thereby cease to be legal tender. Further, it had repealed the provision of the currency and bank notes act, 1914, entitling the holder of a currency note to be paid its face value in gold coin. It had, however, provided that the Bank of England should be bound to sell on demand gold bullion at the price and as therein specified to any person on demand but only in the form of bars containing approximately 400 ounces troy of fine gold. The currency and bank notes act, of 1928, had received the royal assent, though it did not come into operation until November 22, 1928. By that act the Bank of England was authorized to issue bank notes for £1 and for 10s, which were to be legal tender for any amount. Existing currency notes were converted into bank notes, the bank becoming liable upon them; and the bank was empowered to require any person in the United Kingdom owning gold coin or bullion to an amount exceeding £10,000 in value to sell it to the bank on payment (in the case of gold coin) of the nominal value thereof. The country was on the gold standard, but the notes were inconvertible and gold coin was substantially no longer in circulation.

These being the circumstances and conditions of the time, it is not, I think, improper or hazardous to make two surmises: (1) That the gold clause was inserted in clauses 1 and 2 of the bond in contemplation of the contingency of this country going (as it did in 1931) off the gold standard at some future date; and (2) that neither party to the bond can have contemplated payment under the bond being actually made in gold coins.

I turn to the bond to see if from the contents of the document itself it is apparent that the parties did not use the words of the gold clause in accordance with the literal meaning which they would bear if considered apart from the rest of the document and the circumstances which surrounded its execution. A consideration of clause 2 will show, I think, that as there used the words must mean something other than what they say; for, translating the 5½ percent by equal half-yearly payments into the appropriate figures, it becomes a provision for the payment of £2.15.0 "in gold coin of the United Kingdom." The same consideration applies to the interest coupons, which with their express provision for deduction or income tax, would be purporting to provide for a payment "in gold coin of the United Kingdom" of a sum (today) of £2.1.3. Again, if one looks at clause 4 of the bond, the reference which it contains to gold coin of the United Kingdom cannot bear its literal meaning. There is no issue or amount outstanding "in gold coin of the United Kingdom." Taking even clause 1 by itself, it would be practically impossible to fulfill its literal requirements, even if a sufficiency of gold coin were still in circulation, for, according to its strict reading, the coins tendered would all have to be coins of the exact standard of weight and exact standard of fineness specified in the Coinage Act, 1870, without remedy allowance or variation from the standards. Thus neither in clause 1 nor in clause 2 can the words have been intended by the parties to carry their literal interpretation.

I therefore ask myself this question: If the words of the gold clause cannot have been used by the parties in the sense which they literally bear, ought I to ignore them altogether and attribute no meaning to them, or ought I, if I can discover it from the document, to attribute some other meaning to them? Clearly the latter course should be adopted if possible, for the parties must have inserted these special words for some special purpose, and if that purpose can be discerned by legitimate means, effect should be given to it.

In my opinion, the purpose can be discerned from clause 4, in which the reference to gold coin of the United Kingdom is clearly not a reference to the mode of payment but to the measure of the company's obligation. So, too, condition 6, which again is a clause not directed to mode of payment but to describing and measuring liability, shows that the words are used as such a measure. In just the same way I think that in clauses 1 and 2 of the bond the parties are referring to gold coin of the United Kingdom of a specific standard of weight and fineness not as being the mode in which the company's indebtedness is to be discharged but as being the means by which the amount of that indebtedness is to be measured and ascertained. I would construe clause 1 not as meaning that £100 is to be paid in a certain way, but as meaning that the obligation is to pay a sum which would represent the equivalent of £100 if paid in a particular way; in other words, I would construe the clause as though it ran thus (omitting immaterial words: "Pay * * * in sterling a sum equal to the value of £100 if paid in gold coin of the United Kingdom of or equal to the standard of weight and fineness existing on the 1st day of September 1928." I would similarly construe clause 2.

I am conscious, my lords, that this construction strains the words of the document, and that it fits awkwardly with some of its provisions. Thus, for instance, the half-yearly payments in accordance with the coupons (which are described in clause 2 as equal) may, in fact, not be equal. But I prefer this to the only other alternatives, namely, attributing no meaning at all to the gold clause, or attributing to it a meaning which, from other parts of the document and the surrounding circumstances, the parties cannot have intended it to bear.

We were, in the course of the argument, referred to certain decisions and judgments in cases which came before the Permanent Court of International Justice sitting at The Hague. I do not, I need hardly say, treat these as in any way binding upon us. Indeed the relevant facts and words under consideration were very different from those which have been under consideration here. I would like, however, to cite one passage as stating happily and succinctly the considerations and principles which have influenced me in arriving at the conclusion which I have reached. It occurs in the judgment dealing with certain Serbian loans stated to be payable both as to principal and interest in gold. It runs thus: "As it is fundamental that the terms of a contract qualifying the promise are not to be rejected as superfluous, and as the definite word 'gold' cannot be ignored, the question is, What must be deemed to be the significance of that expression? It is conceded that it was the intention of the parties to guard against the fluctuations of the Serbian dinar, and that, in order to procure the loans, it was necessary to contract for repayment in foreign money. But, in so contracting, the parties were not content to use simply the word 'franc', or to contract for payment in French francs, but stipulated for 'gold francs.' It is quite unreasonable to suppose that they were intent on providing for the giving in payment of mere gold specie, or gold coins, without reference to a standard of value. The treatment of the gold clause as indicating a mere modality of payment, without reference to a gold standard of value, would be not to construe but to destroy it."

I would allow this appeal and substitute for the declaration made by Mr. Justice Farwell a declaration in the following terms: "Declare that upon the true construction of the bond the appellant is entitled as holder thereof to receive from the respondents from time to time by way of principal and interest thereunder and on the due dates of payment therefor such a sum in sterling as represents the gold value of the nominal amount of each respective payment, such gold value to be ascertained in accordance with the standard of weight and fineness existing on September 1, 1928, and that accordingly every 'pound' comprised in the nominal amount of each such payment must be treated as representing the price in London in sterling (calculated at the due date of payment) of 123.27447 grains of gold of the standard of fineness specified in the first schedule to the Coinage Act, 1870, and any fraction of a 'pound' comprised in the nominal amount of any such payment must be treated as representing the price in London in sterling (calculated at the due date of payment) of a corresponding fraction of 123.27447 grains of gold of the same standard of fineness."

The view which I take upon the question of construction renders it unnecessary for me to consider the other questions which were debated upon the hearing of the appeal. They do not arise. It would be unwise, and I do not desire to deal with the question whether an effective bargain can be made for a debt to be paid only in one form of legal tender. Still less do I desire to express a view as to the meaning and effect of section 6 of the Coinage Act, 1870.

Lord WRIGHT. My lords, I fully agree in the reasoning and conclusions expressed in the speech just delivered by my noble and learned friend Lord Russell, of Killowen.

Questions put: That the order appealed from be reversed.

THE CONTENTS HAVE IT

That the cause be remitted to the chancery division of the high court of justice with a direction to declare that upon the true construction of the bond the appellant is entitled as holder thereof to receive from the respondents from time to time, by way of principal and interest thereunder and on the due dates of payment therefor, such a sum in sterling as represents the gold value of the nominal amount of each respective payment, such gold value to be ascertained in accordance with the standard of weight and fineness existing on September 1, 1928, and that accordingly every "pound" comprised in the nominal amount of each such payment must be treated as representing the price in London in sterling (calculated at the due date of payment) of 123.27447 grains of gold of the standard of fineness specified in the first schedule to the Coinage Act, 1870, and any fraction of a "pound" comprised in the nominal amount of any such payment must be treated as representing the price in London in sterling (calculated at the due date of payment) of a corresponding fraction of 123.27447 grains of gold of the same standard of fineness.

The contents have it.

Particularly would I call your attention to the paragraph wherein Lord Russell says he would construe the gold clause as if it ran: "pay * * * in sterling a sum equal to the value of £100 paid in gold coin of the United Kingdom of or equal to the standard rate of fineness existing on the 1st day of September, 1928." If our Supreme Court follows the highest court of England, instead of following, as the New York judge unquestionably did, an English lower court, then the confidence of our Attorney General in advising upon the pending bill may prove to have been unwarranted. If our highest court takes the view of the highest English court, then the repudiation bill of last June will go by the board and this bill likewise as far as it attempts to take away from a large part of our citizens without just compensation a huge volume of propery.

The Attorney General has been equally rash in his giving the public to understand that this bill ensures just compensation. He says in effect that this will be secured by giving the owners of the gold engraved pieces of paper saying that there is in the vaults of the Treasury certain metal that if marketed would exchange in the ratio of $20.67 for 1 ounce. Note what the Constitution says in the fifth amendment, that being one of the articles of what is commonly known as the "Bill of Rights":

* * * nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation.

Remember that without the promise to add a Bill of Rights it is highly probable the Constitution would not have been adopted. The amendments comprised in that bill assert rights supposed to be everlasting, unchangeable, paramount. Who can imagine that the Supreme Court would not hold them to control every article in the main body of the Constitution and all the other amendments? The Attorney General displays no doubt that $20.67 an ounce would be "just compensation", as that is the price fixed by law. Yet the President is now paying Frenchmen, Englishmen, Canadians, any other foreigners, $34.45 an ounce. Which figure will the Supreme Court hold to be "just compensation"?

The Attorney General may have overlooked opinions now quoted in this morning's RECORD of yesterday's Senate proceedings, page 914, wherein the Supreme Court held that the ascertainment of just compensation is a judicial function, and "no power exists in any other department of the Government to declare what the compensation shall be or to prescribe any binding rule in that regard." (Monongahela Navigation Co. v. United States (1892), 148 U.S. 312, 327, and United States v. New River Collieries, 262 U.S. (1922) 343, 344.) This means that no statute can prevent the Supreme Court from using its own judgment as to what is "just compensation."

The Attorney General himself cites a case—Ling Su Fan v. United States, 218 U.S. 302, 310—in which the court said of coins: "Their quality as a legal tender is an attribute of law aside from their bullion value." Three quarters of the gold today in the Treasury is in bullion form, and this bill requires the rest to be melted into bullion at once. The daily statement of the United States Treasury that we received this morning reports as a liability, Gold fund, Federal Reserve Board, $1,764,379,065.79; and manifestly a great part of the offsetting assets is in bullion form. It would seem as if the Supreme Court must treat this as bullion, and nothing but bullion.

This, you will see, brings uncertainty not only as to what has been hitherto done in the matter of gold but also as to what we may now do to solve the question, and therefore still further muddies the waters instead of clarifying them.

Gentlemen will cite, on the other hand, the recent decision in the Minnesota case, but if they will read that decision they will see that the views of the majority are based on the fact that the action of the Minnesota Legislature had been taken for a purpose of emergency—that the question was the right of State sovereignty to overrule and suspend the Constitution by reason of a great calamity. It was a matter wholly temporary.

Now, sir, in this question of a just compensation the Supreme Court will be called upon to pass judgment upon permanent legislation, a permanent change in the monetary policy of the land.

Mr. McKEOWN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has 4 minutes.

Mr. LUCE. I regret that I cannot yield.

I wish that the President might have been more candid in telling the people what was the effect of this proposal in the matter of the transfer of gold to the Federal Reserve System. He gave them to understand that the gold certificates to be given in compensation are to be backed by gold.

He said in his message to us:

These gold certificates will be, as now, secured at all times dollar for dollar by gold in the Treasury, gold for each dollar of such weight and fineness as may be established from time to time.

A Member of the House admired for his outstanding intelligence and capacity, who by his committee position is better qualified to understand these things than most of the other Members, reading this when absent, tells me he concluded this meant what it said. He though "security" had its usual meaning and he came back here quite satisfied on that score. Yet, the truth is that "security" means here absolutely nothing beyond the fact that there will be in the Treasury bullion which, if coined, would produce as many dollars as there are in the total of outstanding certificates. The statement contains no obligation whatever. There is not a particle of assurance that the gold will at once, if ever, be exchanged for dollars. I submit that the use of the word "secured" was unfortunate.

Sir, there are back of you on either side portraits of George Washington and Lafayette, with the flag between. Metaphorically they may give you backing, but surely no one would say you are "secured" by their presence. Security implies connection. Nothing is security that cannot be enforced. Unless to pay a debt abroad no man can get an ounce of the gold that is to be impounded. The value of no piece of paper will be enhanced because it says there is gold somewhere. That piece of paper will be nothing but a statement of a fact.

There are other statements of fact known as "certificates." There are birth certificates, there are marriage certificates, and there are death certificates. I prefer to look on those proposed by this bill as death certificates—certificates of the death and burial of 8,000 tons of precious metal. In the future when a guide takes a tourist around the Capital, he will tell of the burial vault under the grim old Treasury, itself suggestive of a mausoleum, and will point to a tablet reading—

Hic Jacet Aurum (here lies gold).
Sterilized and chloroformed. (Long it served mankind. Now it shall slumber until the Day of Resurrection.)

Mr. Speaker, it would have been more candid to let the people know that here we are giving them more of irredeemable currency—the currency so baneful to previous generations, and in our own time as in so many times before, calamitous for the people of other lands. I had hoped, sir—I should have wished—that the message of the President to the Congress would declare in terms so clear as not to be misunderstood against printing-press money; would guard us against fiat money; would guard us against the terrible possibility of inflation that hangs like the darkest of clouds over our heads. That possibility destroys confidence, keeps from action those who can plan and push, prevents return of prosperity. Here you find hidden in the bill, undisclosed by the administration, this danger, and I think that alone may justify any man in registering his opposition. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN].

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, it is impossible for me to discuss the merits of this measure as fully as I should like to do in the short time allotted to me. It is in line with what I have been advocating for the last 4 years. Taken in connection with the bill passed by the last Congress, giving the President the power to revise our monetary system by cutting down the gold content of the dollar, and so forth, it constitutes one of the greatest governmental achievements of all time.

If President Hoover and his administration had done this in 1929, we never would have had this panic. The American people would have been saved the terrible distress through which they have passed during the last 4½ years.

As I listened to the criticisms just made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE], I was reminded of a famous expression of Victor Hugo, when he said that "nothing dies harder or more thoroughly than an old regime." The gentleman from Massachusetts echoes the voice of a dying regime.

The old order is passing away, vanishing as it were, before this onward march of human progress. The ultimate effect of this legislation will be to raise the level of commodity prices and restore prosperity to the masses of the American people. It will particularly benefit the distressed farmers by raising the prices of the things they have to sell, such as wheat, cotton, corn, hogs, land, and lumber. Of course, that will not suit the bondholders of Boston, represented by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE], or the money changers of Wall Street who are bending every effort to defeat this measure and return to the old order under which they could continue to exact their pound of flesh from nearest the heart of suffering humanity.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] deplores the "uncertainty" which this measure will bring to our monetary system. I wonder if he thinks it will bring any more uncertainty in our fiscal affairs than what we have had for the last 10 years, with our financial structure in the hands of private bankers and dominated by private greed. [Applause.]

He ostensibly deplores the fact that this bill will bring about central control of our monetary system because of the authority lodged by it in the Secretary of the Treasury. As a matter of fact, the Secretary of the Treasury is a member of the President's Cabinet. He is answerable at all times to the President of the United States, who is elected by the American people. This bill may not be perfect in that respect, but the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] never complained so long as we were under the old system that led us to wreck and ruin. I, for one, am more than willing to make this change and lodge this power with the President and the Secretary of the Treasury rather than return to the old system, under which our financial affairs were controlled by Eugene Meyer, Andrew W. Mellon, J. P. Morgan, Ogden Mills, and other representatives of Wall Street, who dominated the Federal Reserve System under the old regime and helped to produce the disastrous panic from which we are now emerging. [Applause on Democratic side.]

But the gentleman from Massachusetts calls attention to the fact that the peoples of Europe have been deserting republican forms of government. Probably they have been disappointed at what has transpired in the United States since 1921. When they looked across the Atlantic and saw what was being done by this Government under the old regime; when they saw the purse strings of the Nation turned over to a group of ruthless bankers and the American people driven into the most disastrous depression of all times by their conscienceless misconduct; when they saw our farmers bled white, our transportation systems wrecked, our men driven to bankruptcy and to suicide, and the streets of our large cities streaming with the bread lines of hungry, suffering men, women, and children—when they saw these disastrous consequences of misgovernment in America, it was enough to shake their confidence in the wisdom, stability, and justice of American institutions.

By the example we are setting today may we not hope to again inspire their confidence and to lead them back into the paths of democracy and the practice of self-government, in which the hope of our civilization rests.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] undertakes to get dramatic in his denunciation of this policy which places the gold reserve of our country beyond the reach of the money changers, and tries to prove that it will be worthless, and that our currency will be fiat money. He points to the picture of Washington here on the wall and says that it is there, but asks what it is worth.

Ah, gentlemen, the very fact that this gold cannot be hawked about by greedy financiers will inspire the confidence of the American people in our financial structure. They will know that their gold reserve is placed where moths and rust do not corrupt nor thieves break in and steal.

I have looked on that serene figure of Washington many a time since this depression began, and I believe I voice the sentiment of the American people when I say that I would rather have the faith, the hope, and the courage that even the picture of Washington inspires than to have all the destructive bickerings of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] and all others who believe as he does. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS].

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I cannot, of course, be expected to discuss this rule or this measure in the short time of 3 minutes, but I have asked for this time simply to express my surprise at the position which the gentleman from Massachusetts, as I understood him, took with reference to this bill. I understood the gentleman from Massachusetts to say as one of his three objections that he thought it was not proper, notwithstanding that the people of this country, acting through their chosen representatives, can only devalue the gold content of the dollar; that he believed and considered it a vital objection to this bill that it does not give the profits accruing from the action of the people with reference to the gold dollar to private institutions rather than to the people themselves. To my mind, such a position is wholly untenable. The Government proposes to issue gold certificates, based, as I understand it, on gold in the Treasury, to the banks in return for this gold at its present value. If subsequently the people, acting through their representatives, as I have said, devalue the gold content, causing profits to accrue, it is unthinkable to me that those profits should go to private institutions rather than to the people themselves. That is one practice and one policy that has been pursued in the past which has brought this country to the condition it is in today. This is a new deal, gentlemen, a new deal which has brought the people themselves into the picture, and when they will receive the benefits of government rather than the favored few who have been receiving them in the past. [Applause.]

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PERKINS].

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, we must not think that this is a partisan question. It has nothing to do with partisan politics. I am for the rule and I am for the bill. [Applause.]

I am for this bill because it is a step on the road to the stabilization of our money. I am for it because it puts within the control of the Federal Government absolutely the monetary base, namely, gold. I am for it because it establishes a stabilization fund whereby our dollar in foreign exchange can be stabilized.

Of course, there are many views on this subject. If you sit in a committee dealing with the subject of money and remain there long enough to hear all the experts, your mental condition is that of one who is at sea, adrift, in a fog without compass or chart, and who feels like singing Lead Kindly Light. [Laughter and applause.]

There are just as many experts as there are people; and if you try to follow any school, you soon become so befogged yourself that you are like the judge who said he could decide in favor of the plaintiff when he heard his case, but, having heard the defendant's case, he did not know how to decide.

But we know a few fundamental things. We know, first, that we want the dollar stabilized as nearly as it can be under present conditions. This bill unquestionably leads in that direction. We need at least some guidance in that direction at the present time. There is no unanimity of opinion among the experts. In fact, there is nothing but diversity and division of thought and resultant confusion, and for my part I intend to follow the President of the United States at the present time rather than attempt to reconcile all the varying different schools of monetary thought. [Applause.]

One objection advanced against the bill is that it devalues the dollar. We heard just recently from high authority that you cannot devalue the dollar unless the dollar already has depreciated.

At the present time the President can devalue the dollar anywhere from 100 cents to 50 cents. This bill limits the devaluation to between 60 cents and 50 cents, and tends to give confidence to the people that when the dollar is devalued they will know within 10 percent where the value of the dollar is finally to be fixed.

Of course, there are features of this bill that some of us would like to see changed. We do not like the idea of one man absolutely controlling this vast stabilization fund; but gentlemen, this is an emergency, and the President cannot wait until a board could be set up. If the handling of this stabilization fund were placed in a board of three or five members, great delay in selecting and setting up that board would result. If that method be a better method than the one set up in the bill, I am sure that the administration later would agree to it, but this is an emergency, Mr. Speaker; the stabilization must begin promptly. It would take weeks, if not months, to establish a board; and while I would personally rather see three men or five men control this vast fund, yet for the present I would rather see the bill enacted than to have it delayed for that period of time.

Now, there has been quite some gloomy views expressed on the question of taking over the gold into the Treasury. How many Members of this House know how the gold now stands? How many of you could answer how much gold is in the Treasury and how much is in the Federal Reserve banks? Before our committee late yesterday afternoon the chairman of one of the Federal Reserve banks testified that the entire monetary gold in the Federal Treasury is only $500,000,000, and that the monetary gold in the Federal Reserve banks is at the present time $3,500,000,000.

If we are to have a stable dollar, how can we get it better than is proposed by this bill, by bringing all of the gold into the Federal Treasury? I am not worrying about the issuance of these certificates to the Federal Reserve banks. It is a long time since I personally have had any gold in my pocket. I do not believe we need look with a gloomy view about this gold being put into the Treasury and "sterilized and glorified." If all of the monetary base is in the Treasury, that gold can be used like ballast in a ship. Does the captain worry because the ballast is "sterilized or glorified"? The object of bringing this gold into the Treasury is that when the ship careens too far to one side, it can be used as a counterbalance on the other side. Undoubtedly we are reaching a serious change in our monetary system. Why should we not have some change? We have had very little change of any kind for some time. It is undoubted that the system under which we have been operating for the last few years has not been a successful system. Shall we remain in the doldrums or shall we attempt to make some change for the better? It is quite impossible to know all of the ramifications of this bill. As to the operation of any legislative plan, we have to take a great deal on faith, and I have faith in this bill. I am willing to accept the conclusions of the President rather than to attempt to consolidate in the one bill all the varying theories of the experts we have heard before the committee for the last 8 or 10 years.

Mr. PARSONS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PERKINS. I yield.

Mr. PARSONS. Is it not a fact that this does not devalue gold? It appreciates gold. In other words, it raises the price of gold. According to the markets of last fall a year ago, 1932, in farm products, stocks and bonds, and general physical properties, was not the gold dollar appreciated to the extent of about 75 percent or perhaps more?

Mr. PERKINS. Undoubtedly the gold dollar has been constantly appreciating, and consequently everything else has been constantly depreciating. The idea of this bill is to bring all the gold into the Treasury and not to use gold as currency at all. The idea is to have certain definite value back of our currency, in the form of gold, because that is the only exchange value in the markets of the world.

Mr. PARSONS. And are not the coinage and the regulation of the value of money a function of government?

Mr. PERKINS. Unquestionably; and it ought to be more completely under the control of the Federal Government now. [Applause.]

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, the rule itself is a wide-open rule. [Applause.] There is no gag in it. It permits of amendments to the bill and merely provides a limitation of 3 hours on debate, with a provision waiving points of order, which is made necessary by the fact that there is an appropriation in the bill which would not be in order if the rule did not carry this waiver.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] has been most gracious and considerate to his own party. He described the condition in which we found ourselves on March 4, after 12 years of Republican rule, as a "frying pan"; he said we were now in a "frying pan." I think he is very modest about it; I think "stew" would be a better word than "fry."

The gentleman objects to the placing of power in one man, meaning the Secretary of the Treasury. I suppose if a Mellon or a Mills were presiding there, this objection would not lie on the Republican side of the House. In our form of government we have control over any one man and over any group of men. The President has control over his appointee in the Treasury, whoever for the moment he may be; and with the legislative control Congress has over every one of the President's actions, this democracy of ours need never fear one man or any group of men in this country. [Applause.]

I know what was behind the argument of the gentleman from Massachusetts. He typifies the elephant; he has those three letters printed all over him. For 12 years it was "G.O.P.", but when we took control of the Government we found it has been changed to "I O U"

The Republican theory of government, as announced by the gentleman from Massachusetts, is that off there somewhere is the "Federal Government", and off here somewhere are the "American people." He says we are going to take these billions of dollars away from the American people and give them to the Federal Government. Of course, the Republican theory is that the people have no voice in their Government; that they are not fit to govern; that a few people, "the Old Guard", are ordained to administer the affairs of government. But the Democratic theory is that there is no difference, no distinction, no separation between the American people and their Government. [Applause.] The American people are the Government of the United States. [Applause.]

This is a happy day for the American people. No one here will gainsay the fact that 99 percent of the people in every spot of this Nation are solidly behind the President and behind his program; and we shall see the will of the people consummated probably more perfectly here today in the enactment of this measure, probably more important than any one other feature of the President's great recovery program.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] said that "the wheels of industry might be turning" had the President taken this action sooner.

Why, Mr. Speaker, on the 4th of March last the wheels had stopped dead. The gentleman from Massachusetts can vouch for this himself—that in his own State the wheels and the spindles today are turning and business is recovering and millions of people have been put back to work who were thrown out of work prior to March 4. The American people know this, even though some Representatives or some bankers do not know it. The American people know who is responsible for it, and they are ready to back up their elected Representatives in this House in making one further step to support the President in his great program of recovery. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. SOMERS of New York. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 6976) to protect the currency system of the United States, to provide for the better use of the monetary gold stock of the United States, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 6976) to protect the currency system of the United States, to provide for the better use of the monetary gold stock of the United States, and for other purposes, with Mr. BANKHEAD in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

By unanimous consent, the first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

Mr. SOMERS of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES].

Mr. DIES. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this bill, as has been pointed out, is to seek in conjunction with other recovery plans to establish a fairer price level and eventually attain a less variable purchasing power for the dollar. The bill limits the power of the President to revalue the gold dollar between 50 and 60 percent and eliminates with a great deal of uncertainty in regard to the extent of revaluation. In order to accomplish the revaluation of the gold dollar, the bill transfers to the United States the ownership and possession of all Federal Reserve bank gold and provides for payment therefor in gold certificates. This will give to the Government the profits estimated at two and two-thirds billions in the case of a 60-percent devaluation and four billions in the event of a 50-percent devaluation, which may accrue as the result of this increase in the statutory value of the gold dollar. This money will be used to create the stabilization fund provided for in the bill, and eventually, after the necessity for the maintenance of the stabilization fund has ceased, these profits will be used to reduce the Treasury deficit. There are many other provisions in the bill amendatory of existing laws which are made necessary on account of the revaluation of the gold dollar, the acquisition of gold, and the creation of the stabilization fund. But the fundamental and primary purpose of the bill is, through the revaluation of the gold dollar and the creation of the stabilization fund, to establish a fairer price level, create a less variable purchasing power for the dollar, and protect our own country from the deliberate undervaluation of foreign currencies in the markets of the world.

I do not profess to be an expert on the monetary question. I have listened to the testimony of many eminent authorities on this subject, and I find few of them who are willing to hazard a definite opinion in regard to the effects of certain monetary changes. Since I have been a member of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures we have had rather exhaustive hearings involving much of the subject matter of this bill, as well as many other questions affecting gold, silver, and currencies. I have for a long time contended that we should revalue the gold dollar, and on March 20, 1933, I introduced a bill, H.R. 14374, which was referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, and which had for its purpose the revaluation of the gold dollar by reducing its content 33⅓ percent and authorizing the purchase of silver and the payment therefor in certificates. A hearing was had on this bill before our committee, but no definite action has been taken.

It must be apparent to every thinking man that our price level must be restored in order that our enormous public and private indebtedness, incurred principally in the period from 1917 to 1929, can be discharged. It has been estimated that our public and private indebtedness aggregates the enormous sum of $230,000,000,000, as compared with a very small prewar debt. These debts, for the most part, were contracted when the dollar had a considerably less purchasing power than now prevails. Since these debts were contracted, the dollar has increased in terms of wholesale commodities 56 percent above the normal purchasing power of the dollar for the years 1921 to 1929, as ascertained by the United States Department of Labor. Warren and Pearson conclude as a result of their careful studies that—

> To restore the price level to the debt level will require that the Bureau of Labor Statistics index number of price of all commodities be restored approximately to the 1926 level, or that this index rise from 87 in February to approximately 146, when prewar is 100, or from 60 to 100, when 1926 is 100.

To restore this price level is in the interest of debtor and creditor alike. Without an increase in the price level the debtors will be unable to discharge their obligations and the creditor will risk the loss of both principal and interest. On the other hand, if the price level is increased or, expressing the same thing, if the purchasing power of the dollar is restored to the 1926 level, the debtor will be able to pay off his debts in the same kind of money that he borrowed.

Those who contend that the restoration of the 1926 price level constitutes a repudiation of honest obligations and those who cry out that the return of the dollar to its 1926 purchasing power is inflation are in error. It is not only morally and legally right that this should be done, but in my judgment it is essential to our economic stability. The history of the world furnishes many precedents for this action, and it is by no means an experiment. We are not the only country that has been confronted with the serious problem of debt. In discussing the important part that debt played in the destruction of Rome, one great author said:

> Credit is the great weapon of the aristocracy against the lower class. The nobility was thereby enabled to place in its power the small farmers, whose labor and lives it controlled until the day when they realized that they were oppressed and formed alliances strong enough to break for the time being their serfdom. The concentration of land reposed to a great extent on the workings of the credit system, the property of the rich increasing almost automatically by the addition of that of the poor, and the seizure of the mortgaged property being the main reason for this expropriation.

The problem of debt was so serious in Rome that the Government adopted the most drastic measures in dealing with it. In 342 B.C. Rome abolished interest altogether. In 352 B.C. a state commission of five bankers was appointed to adjust the strained relations between debtors and creditors, and their efforts seem to have met with some success. Pliny states that during the first Punic War the Roman dollar was diminished in weight from 1 pound to 2 ounces, and the power of money fell to such a point that he says:

> Thus a profit of five sixths was made and debts were canceled to that extent.

The remission of debts was often the slogan of the peasant and workers, and at one time they forced the passage of a law that reduced all debts and decreed that interest payments in the past would be applied on the principal. But the ablest historians agree that through the power of money and credit exercised by a select few and manipulated to suit their interests the sources of wealth were concentrated in their hands and the majority was reduced to enforced idleness and poverty.

After the World War, France was burdened with a crushing debt, but she proceeded to liquidate the indebtedness of her citizenship by the Government increasing the quantity of money, and thereby increasing the price of her farm and other commodities. France increased the quantity of her money 5 times, and her wholesale prices increased 7 times, while her farm commodity prices increased 6 times. According to researches conducted by Columbia University, prices rose with the volume of money in 1919 and 1920, fell with it in 1921 and 1922, and rose again from 1923 to 1926.

Of course, there was a great depreciation in the purchasing power of the franc, as measured in the terms of the gold dollar. In 1913 the value of the franc in terms of dollars was 100, but it steadily decreased year by year until in 1926 it was 17. The value of the franc, in terms of its wholesale purchasing power, fell from 100 in 1913 to 14 in 1926. According to the conclusions reached by the council conducting this research, certain advantages resulted from the inflation as well as certain disadvantages. The advantages were: First, the debts, with interest and other fixed charges, were greatly reduced. The French farmers profited from the inflation, in the words of the Council, as follows:

> On the whole, it appears that changes in the costs of farm production did not keep pace with changes in the price of farm products, so that in all probability the French peasant and farmer found a certain advantage in inflation. Their labor costs, their expenditures for fertilizers, their mortgage charges, were all reduced.

French industry profited from the inflation as follows, in the words of the Council:

> The low gold values of French manufactured products brought about a certain expansion of markets abroad. The diminution in costs of production stimulated industrial activity, while the flight from the franc on the domestic market opened a sufficient home outlet for the increased flow of goods. It was mainly through its effects on the costs of production that inflation exerted a direct influence on industrial output. This is fairly obvious in the case of that element of cost which consists of interest paid on capital charges. An industrial firm which had issued a million francs' worth of bonds before the war at the current rate of 3½ percent was still paying 35,000 francs per year in 1926 as interest. In that year, however, these 35,000 francs were worth only 5,000 francs in terms of 1913 purchasing power. From the point of view of prevailing prices in 1926, therefore, the rate of interest on this loan fell from 3½ percent to one half of 1 percent. Such economies enabled businesses to sell at lower prices and stimulated production and sales. The general opinion seems to be, for example, that the farm laborer and the small peasant were better off in the postwar period than before the war. They are said to be better fed, to eat more frequently, to be better clothed and housed than ever before.

The disadvantages of inflation to French agriculture on account of inflation are summed up by the council as follows:

On the other hand, machinery cost them dearly and they had difficulty in obtaining sufficient labor and credit. These difficulties were so serious that they often resulted to the abandonment of farm lands.

However, this research council found that the French Government immediately did away with the difficulty of securing credit by placing at the disposal of the rural credit associations vast sums of money and allowed these associations to loan to the farmers on easy conditions. The rate of interest on long-term loans made by the above associations to the farmers was invariably 2 percent up to the middle of 1927, when it was raised to 3 percent.

In regard to the disadvantages to industry the council concluded as follows:

In the later years of inflation French industry suffered, however, from the scarcity of capital.

The reason that uncontrolled and unmanaged inflation produced a scarcity of capital is because those who had money were afraid to make long-term loans on account of the falling value of the franc and the uncertainty of collecting in francs whose value was the same as when they were loaned.

Mr. Chairman, at this point I desire to insert several paragraphs from the instructive book on Prices, written by Warren and Pearson, which may be of interest to those who desire to know the effect of revaluation upon the price level and business activity:

Legal changes in the weight of gold in the monetary unit: There are innumerable cases in history of changing the weight of gold and silver in the monetary unit. In 1834 the weight of gold in the dollar was reduced by 6.26 percent. (See p. 87.)

The pound sterling was originally 1 pound of silver with a purity of 37/40, which was known as sterling fineness. Although the name of the pound was retained, the weight was reduced from time to time until it stood at a little less than a third of a pound of silver at the time of the adoption of the gold standard. The name is still retained, but it is not a pound, not sterling, not silver. At the time this is written it is not gold, and it promises to be reduced in weight when it again becomes gold.

Before the World War the French franc was 290.322 milligrams of pure gold. On June 25, 1928, it was reduced to 58.95 milligrams. Public and private debts and all other monetary transactions could then be paid with a franc having a value similar to its value when most of these obligations were incurred.

Since France was still inflating her currency up to 1926 she avoided the depression of 1920 and most of the depression of 1929–30 because her price level was five times pre-war (fig. 98).

The decline in 1931 caused a depression in France, but nothing comparable to the situation in England and the United States. The only public or private debts that were troublesome were those that were contracted at a price level of over four times pre-war.

On October 25, 1926, the Belgian currency was established on a gold basis with a new unit of currency, the belga, with a content of 209.211 milligrams of fine gold and a fixed relationship to the Belgian paper franc of about 7 to 1. By this act Belgium reduced the weight of gold in the franc from 290.322 milligrams of fine gold to 41.842 milligrams.

Before the war the Italian lira was 290.322 milligrams of fine gold. On December 22, 1927, this was reduced to 79.1911 milligrams. Public and private debts were therefore payable at approximately the price level at which they were incurred, and all services and charges were left in the same relationship which they held previous to stabilization.

Since Italy was inflating the currency up to 1927, she avoided the deflation of 1920. Prices fell in 1931 so that deflation was felt (fig. 99).

Germany inflated her currency until it became almost worthless. On November 15, 1923, the rentenmark was provided for. One trillion of the old paper marks was equal to one rentenmark. These were replaced by the gold reichmark in the autumn of 1924.

The inflation was extremely serious for the country, but the serious effects of deflation were avoided. Any debts that were incurred with the paper mark could be paid with the rentenmark at the ratio of 1 trillion to 1. There was no need to reduce the innumerable fixed prices, because stabilization at the fantastic level was nevertheless a continuance of the old price level. This was entirely different from deflation.

Germany felt the full effect of the deflation of 1929–31, because she had incurred a new indebtedness and fixed charges at the price levels of 1925–29.

In 1931–32 England and 31 other countries discontinued the gold standard. Presumably most of these countries will follow the example of France and Italy and reduce the weight of gold in their currencies when they return to a gold basis.

No country likes to revalue its money, but when prices have risen too high an attempt to deflate causes such universal bankruptcy that creditors instead of profiting by being paid money with a higher value lose so much of the principal that it is to their interest, as well as to the interest of debtors, to revalue the currency. An attempt to deflate requires such unusual and drastic writing down of debts, wages, freight rates, telephone charges, fees, and every other economic charge as to cause unemployment, reduced national production, and national poverty. To attempt to meet such a situation government loans, price-control measures, and other undesirable legislation is tried. Rather than undergo these calamities it is much better to revalue the currency and allow business to proceed.

Prices in 1931, at the time when a large number of the countries gave up the effort to deflate, are shown in table 28. At this time prices in England had declined 65 percent from the average of the 24 months with highest prices. This amount of price decline caused such prolonged unemployed, so many bankruptcies, and other disastrous conditions that the process could not be continued. By doles and other means national governments had attempted to tide over the situation, but such drastic deflation proved to be beyond the power of national finance to alleviate.

This leaves the United States with a price decline of 57 percent as the most striking deflation for any large country that continued the effort to maintain its pre-war currency. In 10 to 20 years the full results of this effort will be apparent.

Revaluing the currency is a single drastic procedure to correct a single situation. It does not provide a continuing stability of money. France and Italy revalued their money in conformity with their price level when commodity prices in the gold-using countries were about 40 percent above pre-war. This avoided any of the difficulty that the United States and England experienced in going from a price level of more than 200 to 140, but it did not avoid the difficulties that came with the decline in prices in 1931–32. If England and the other countries that left the gold basis in 1931 revalue their currencies so as to bring their prices back to the level of 1929 they will be in a better position than France, as they will avoid the continuance of the deflated prices of 1932.

Many obligations contain the "gold clause", calling for payment in gold dollars of present weight and fineness. This clause is most frequent in bonds of various units of government and corporations. It does not apply to most farm mortgages, life insurance, or ordinary business transactions. According to the Constitution, "Congress shall have power * * * to coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin, and fix the standard of weights and measures" (art. I, sec. 8).

"No person shall * * * be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law * * *"—amendment V.

"No State shall pass any * * * law impairing the obligation of contracts * * *"—article 1, section 10.

If it becomes necessary to change the dollar, there is little question of the power of Congress to invalidate such contracts. Many Supreme Court decisions have held that while States may not invalidate contracts, Congress can do so.

In any event, revaluation would allow payment of the many debts in dollars and would allow adjustment of the innumerable fixed charges that wreck business when prices fall, so that business would proceed and there would be money with which to pay debts, taxes, and wages. The gold clause is a trival matter compared with the restoration of the opportunity to work. If deflation is continued, it is not a question of the kind of money in which debts will be paid but a question of what debts can be paid at all.

The question is often raised as to just what would happen if the price of gold were raised 50 percent. Innumerable charges that have not declined would not rise, but would be relieved of the necessity of declining. Among these are public and private debts, freight rates, telephone charges, and the like. Total tax payments would increase because taxes could be paid. Therefore, tax rates would be lowered.

Prices of cotton and wheat at export points would rise a little more than 50 percent. The following illustrations are based on prices for December 1932. If wheat at New York rose from 64 to 96 cents, wheat in Nebraska would rise about 32 cents. There have been so many examples of just such a change that we can be sure of the effect on the Nebraska price. But this would more than double the Nebraska price. Corn at New York City would also increase about 50 percent, or about 21 cents per bushel. This would much more than double prices on Iowa farms.

The above changes would occur without change in prices in foreign countries. The increased business which rising prices cause would result in still further price increases. These would be very decided increases for basic commodities.

Even with no improved prospects for business, prices of industrial stocks would increase about 50 percent. Prices of such stocks in London and New York keep on the same basis in ounces of gold. On December 15, 1932, 1.6 ounces of gold were required to buy a share of United States Steel stock in London, and 1.5 ounces were required in New York. On the same day 0.73 ounces of gold were required to buy a share of Pennsylvania Railroad stock in London and 0.71 ounces in New York. Of course, a rise in the price level would stimulate business and cause much more than a 50-percent increase in security prices. A bale of cotton was worth 1.5 ounces of gold in New York and 1.8 ounces in England.

The value of lumber and other building materials in a house would at once rise by 50 percent. This would stop bankrupt sales and, before long, would result in more building. Lumber far from market would rise in price by a much greater percentage. The prices of cement, brick, and metals would also advance.

In general, those prices which have not declined would be relieved of the necessity of declining and prices of basic commodities far from market would rise most. These effects are the same as a rise in prices brought about by any other cause.

There would be one major difference—gold would also rise in price. Expectation of such a change would probably result in hoarding gold. It would, however, be much more profitable to hoard basic commodities, such as lumber, cotton, corn, wheat, copper, and the like, at points far from market. It would also be more profitable to hoard common stocks than gold. With everything else at panic prices, gold would be one of the least profitable things to hold.

If such a change were made in the price of gold, it would probably be preceded by the suspension of gold payments, as has been the case in most of the world, or would probably require the suspension of such payments while the subject was being discussed.

WHAT WILL HAPPEN IF THE GOLD VALUE OF THE DOLLAR IS REDUCED ENOUGH TO RESTORE AN EQUILIBRIUM IN THE PRICE STRUCTURE?

Wholesale prices of all commodities would gradually rise to the average level that prevailed at the time public and private debts were contracted and the level to which taxes, costs of distribution, and other slow-moving charges are adjusted. This would require that wholesale prices be restored to approximately the 1926 level. Costs of distribution would then be more nearly in adjustment with wholesale prices than they were in 1926 because they would rise less than they have declined. They were out of adjustment in 1926. Prices of basic commodities would for a time be higher than prices of all commodities, but would later come into adjustment automatically.

Index numbers of prices of food at retail would rise a little higher than prices paid to farmers because, even at the wholesale-price level of 1926, costs of distribution would be rather high. The only thing that could change this would be a shortage of food relative to other commodities, which would make farm prices high relative to retail prices. Such a shortage is a possibility. Much of the apparent surplus is due to low consumption because of unemployment in the countries that have not reflated.

The cost of living would be somewhat lower than in 1926 because costs of distribution would be lower than they were in that year and because rents would not rise to the 1926 level. The index numbers of the cost of living would be somewhat higher than the index numbers of wholesale prices, but not so much higher as they were in 1926.

The long-time trend of wages in the United States is to rise in purchasing power at the rate of 1.71 percent per year. This is practically the same as the normal increase in output of commodities per capita. The buying power of wages is thrown out of line by either inflation or deflation. A restoration of the price level would avoid the long years of unemployment that are an inevitable accompaniment of deflation.

If the pre-war trend of wages had continued to 1934, and if wholesale prices had remained at the 1910–14 level, or 100, wages would have been expected to be 144, which is the normal increase in purchasing power in 21.5 years.

If wholesale prices return to the 1926 level (146 when 1910–14 equals 100), wages would be expected to be 210.

In 1926, city wages were 235; farm wages 171; wages of Government employees, 161; and college professors, 157. In the spring of 1933 wages were in utter chaos. Many persons were working on farms and elsewhere for less than pre-war wages. Some workers were receiving almost as high wages as they received in 1929. A restoration of the commodity price level would gradually bring approximate equilibrium in wage rates for different kinds of work.

If wholesale prices of all commodities are restored to the 1926 level and the cost-of-living index is somewhat higher than the all-commodity index but somewhat lower than it was in 1929, as is to be expected, it is probable that the general level of all wages will return approximately to the 1926 level. Wages paid to farm labor were relatively low in 1926. They would probably rise above the 1926 level. Wages in the construction industry were relatively high in 1926 and might not return to that level. All the above discussion is based on a restoration of the price level so as to stop deflation without causing inflation. If instead of reflation the deflation process is resumed, the chaos of 1932 will begin again. If a policy is followed which will raise commodity prices much above the level of 1926, price relationships of the type that developed from 1916 to 1917 would result.

Not only did France revalue her money and depreciate its purchasing power, but England did likewise. The English and United States index numbers were identical for the years 1928 and 1930. After England left the gold standard and in February 1933, the English index stood at 91 and the United States index at 69.

I am not prepared to say what the precise effect of the revaluation of the gold dollar 50 or 60 percent will have upon the rise of the price level. I do not say that an immediate increase will accompany the revaluation of the dollar, or that the increase will approximate the degree of the revaluation. I realize that there are many factors apart from the monetary question which enter into the rise of the price level, but from the experiences of other nations, and the weight of authorities who profess to understand this subject, I am confident that eventually the rise in the price level must follow the revaluation of the gold dollar. It is also my opinion that the revaluation of the gold dollar, if accompanied by the issuance of sufficient currency based upon this new statutory value and placed in circulation, will effectuate a material rise in the price level and an increased depreciation in the purchasing price of the American dollar. I also believe that the revaluation of the gold dollar, and the skillful manipulation of the stabilization fund to be created from the profits of revaluation, will raise wholesale commodity prices and contribute to the restoration of the normal purchasing power of the dollar. At least this much can be said, that if the President and the Secretary of the Treasury exercise the powers conferred upon them in this bill in conjunction with the recovery program heretofore adopted, we may expect a material rise in commodity prices.

There are those that will urge that this bill is unnecessary because the gold dollar has already depreciated in purchasing power approximately 40 percent and that this bill will accomplish nothing in the way of price increase unless the President should decide to fix the revaluation at 50 percent. It is true that there has been an external depreciation of the dollar. As measured in terms of foreign currency, the dollar might be said to have depreciated in the markets of the world, but this cannot be said of our dollar, insofar as its domestic purchasing power is concerned. If there has been an internal depreciation, it has not been nearly so great as it has externally.

It cannot be argued even by the most conservative that the dollar should be revalued on the pre-war basis. To do so would be to overvalue our dollar in comparison with foreign currencies, which would mean that we would surrender the markets of the world to our competitors and crush our own people under a staggering debt burden which could only be discharged through the bankruptcy courts and foreclosure sales. It would mean a price level which would preclude the possibility of normal business conditions during our age and generation.

The creation of this stabilization fund is not a question of choice or expediency, but a matter of self-preservation. In order to protect our people from the well-organized and skillfully executed plans of the British exchange equalization fund, we are compelled to equip our Government with similar powers and resources. To anyone who has given any study to the subject, it appears certain that England has used her enormous equalization fund of 350,000,000 pounds for the purpose of increasing the purchasing power of the dollar in relation to foreign currencies. In this manner she has made our export products dear to foreign buyers and at the same time she has been able to capture our market by selling her own products cheaper. I know that there are some who will deny this.

The English leaders have given out various reasons for the maintenance of this fund, for instance, that it is intended to iron out minor fluctuations in the exchange value of the pound and to control major movements of the pound and protect England from sudden withdrawals of capital; but these reasons are given out to deceive the simple. The real purpose of this enormous fund is to undervalue the English sterling in relation to other currencies so that England will enjoy a superior trade advantage on the markets of the world and depress the price level in other countries. In fact, the members of the House of Commons have charged the Government with this purpose. On May 9, 1933, a Labor member of the House of Commons protested that it was—

A lot of cant and hypocrisy to suggest that this money (a mere billion dollars additional for the fund) was wanted for any other purpose than to carry on an exchange war.

A few typical remarks made in the House of Commons on May 4, 1933, when the addition of a billion dollars to the fund was under consideration will show the depth of the conviction:

I quite appreciate that the part of the fund which is ironing out day-to-day fluctuation, and which is operating satisfactorily at the present time, is a useful part of export trade. (Sir S. Cripps.)

What is the policy of the Chancellor of the Exchequer? What does it amount to? It is a sort of dole, a supplement, to the trade of the country. (Mr. David Mason.)

With this sum they were going to compete with the United States Government, which was trying to monopolize gold by monopolizing gold, trying to injure the foreign trade of this country. (Mr. S. Samuel.)

I believe that he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) will be well advised not to pursue the will-o'-the-wisp of gambling in foreign exchanges in order to keep sterling at an artificially low level. (Mr. Boothby.)

We have seen in the last 20 years the greatest war in the history of our time. We have also seen the greatest tariff war, and now we are seeing the greatest exchange war. (Mr. A. Bevan.)

Of course, there are those who will argue that these Members are influenced by political bias, but there is other evidence available which cannot be so easily disputed. But before stating this evidence permit me to give a brief history of this exchange-equalization fund. In April 1932 the Chancellor of the Exchequer announced the Government's intention to establish an exchange-equalization account to give the authorities the means to intervene in the exchange markets in order to check undesirable speculation in sterling and to even out seasonal fluctuation. The account had as its nucleus the balance of the gold dollar exchange reserve, amounting to £25,000,000, and, in addition, was given borrowing powers up to £150,000,000. When this fund was created at the beginning of July 1932 the account took over from the Bank of England the substantial holdings of foreign currencies, principally dollars and francs, which had been acquired during the previous spring. It began to operate at once with the greatest secrecy. Its operations are under the law of England veiled in secrecy, and there is no way of ascertaining its activities except by appraising the results. By November 1932 the sterling rate had fallen until it reached a low point of $3.14. During the first 6 months of the existence of this fund its operation had been so successful and satisfactory that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had by the end of last year decided to ask Parliament's approval to a substantial increase in the borrowing powers of the account. These powers were increased by £200,000,000, which gave the authorities in charge of the fund ample powers to carry out the functions of the account. It is believed in informed circles that the fund made a considerable profit through short selling and other manipulations.

When December 15 arrived the fund made a neat profit of £10,000,000 by receiving the full paper value of the £19,500,000 ($95,000,000) debt payment from the Government, a sum which amounted to £29,500,000 in currency, and then buying gold at par from the Bank of England for shipment to the United States. In January the fund began to draw gold from America in considerable quantities. The authorities in charge of this fund bought dollars with sterling and thereby lowered the purchasing power of sterling. They then converted these dollars into gold and shipped the gold to the Bank of England, until they had gotten from us three times the amount of gold paid to us in December. With the tremendous funds given to the account, it is able to buy foreign exchange and then convert this foreign exchange into gold. As a result of its operations, the Bank of England has increased its gold stock from £121,000,000 in January 1933 to £192,000,000 on November 8, 1933, with a result that the Bank of England has more gold than it possessed while England was on the gold standard.

But the proof that England has operated this fund in order to overvalue the dollar and undervalue the sterling, or, in plainer terms, to make the dollar dear and the sterling cheap, and thereby make it unprofitable for foreign buyers to purchase our products, can be best appreciated by considering the beneficial results that have come from the operation of this fund. Since the creation of this fund England's trade balance has changed remarkably. In 1931 England's adverse trade balance was 406.7 million pounds. In 1932 it had been reduced to 287.1 million pounds. For the first 4 months of this year the adverse balance was 78.4 million pounds as against 99.2 million pounds in the corresponding period of last year. England has been able to repay the £130,000,000 exchange credit raised in defense of sterling in 1931. She loaned £30,000,000 to the French Government, and, as previously stated, the Bank of England's gold reserve has tremendously increased. In addition to this the Bank of England has accumulated foreign currencies in excess of £100,000,000.

The effect of the operation of this fund in depreciating the sterling as compared with foreign currency on wholesale commodity prices shows that England has enjoyed a distinct advantage. Taking the figure 100 as pre-war, in September 1931 the wholesale prices in Great Britain stood at 94.9. At the same time it stood at 90.1 in the United States and 87.4 in France. In March 1933 it stood at 92.4 in Great Britain, 75.8 in the United States, and 76.8 in France. The figures in reference to the cost of living are also striking. In September 1931 the figure for Great Britain was 145, for the United States 148, and for France 115. However, in March the figure stood at 137 for Great Britain, 132 for the United States, and 105 for France. The truth is that from the time England abandoned the gold standard in 1931 until the time the United States abandoned it, England, through the manipulation of the equalization fund, enjoyed a distinct advantage over France and the United States. The same can be said of France prior to the time that England abandoned the gold standard. In 1927 the wholesale price figure for Great Britain was 144.8, for the United States 185.9, and for France 127. Whereas in September 1931 the figure for Great Britain was 94.9, for the United States 90.1, and for France 87.4. So that in the operation of this fund since its creation, England has succeeded in depreciating the sterling about 30 percent in the exchange value of sterling.

I have presented these facts in order to show that it is imperative that we resist the operations of the equalization fund. The only feasible method by which this can be accomplished is to establish a similar fund, and to clothe the Secretary of the Treasury and the President with equal powers and resources. I know that it is urged that the operation of this stabilization fund should be made public in order to avoid the possibility of mismanagement. The same thing was contended by members of Parliament when the equalization fund was created in England, but the Parliament decided that the success of the fund would be destroyed if its operations were not veiled in the greatest secrecy. For the same reason Congress will have to impose confidence in the honesty and integrity of the Secretary of the Treasury and the President.

The Secretary of the Treasury is directly responsible to the President, and must furnish periodical reports to him. The President is directly responsible to the Congress and to the Nation. If we should ever be so unfortunate as to have an unscrupulous President, he could, independent of the fund, misappropriate unlimited public funds.

It may be argued that the creation of this stabilization fund would precipitate a currency war between England and the United States or between the United States and other nations. I do not believe this. The only currency war that we would wage would be one in self-defense. To the contrary, I believe that the creation of this fund would hasten the day when we can return to a stabilized currency. When Europe finds out that we are no longer willing to be made the willing dupes and innocent victims of their duplicity and cunning, it will increase their respect for us and at the same time make them realize that it is to their advantage to desist from further currency manipulations.

This is a vital part of a national program to protect America for Americans and to demand from the world that respect to which our generosity entitles us.

Permit me to summarize the beneficial results which it is hoped that this bill will accomplish:

First. It will contribute substantially to the gradual rise of the wholesale prices of all commodities to the average level that prevailed at the time public and private debts were contracted, and the level to which taxes, costs of distribution, and other slow-moving charges are adjusted.

Second. It will give to the Government between two and three-quarter billions and four billions to establish and operate a stabilization fund on account of the profits accruing from revaluation.

Third. When the stabilization fund is no longer needed, this money will be used to reduce the public debt and thereby lighten the burden of taxation.

Fourth. It will furnish the Government with adequate weapons to prevent the undervaluation of foreign currencies or the overvaluation of the dollar so that American exportable surpluses can be sold to foreign buyers. This will enable us to recapture some of the markets of the world.

Fifth. That part of the profits accruing from revaluation which are not needed to effectually operate the stabilization fund can be distributed in the form of new currency through some medium of circulation, such as the Civil Works program, or the payment of the adjusted-service certificates, or it can be applied to the immediate reduction of the Treasury deficit.

Sixth. The limitation of the President's power to revalue the gold dollar between 50 and 60 percent will answer the objections of those who contend that resumption of normal business activity is retarded on account of the uncertainty of the extent to which the dollar will be revalued.

I am frank to confess that this bill does not go as far as I would like for it to. I am convinced that we should broaden the base of our monetary system and increase our reserve by the use of silver. The inadequate supply of the world stock of gold, its diminishing production, and the absence of any convincing proof that new mines are likely to be discovered in the near future, combined with the unequal distribution of the gold supply among three nations, convince me that we must use silver as a supplement to gold. I shall not enter into a discussion of the question as to whether or not the supply of monetary gold is sufficient to support the currency and credit structure of the world, maintain the necessary price level, and serve as a medium of international exchange. Many eminent authorities, such as Warren and Pearson, advance rather convincing facts to support their contention that the supply is inadequate. But whether they are right or wrong, it is generally agreed that with three nations owning most of the monetary gold of the world, it will be a long time before this gold stock can be redistributed in such a manner as to suffice for the metallic base of the currency system of the world.

The nations that own this gold are going to resist all efforts to deprive them of it. But if we were to add silver to gold as our monetary base, we could not only provide a sufficient base for our currency and credit system and thereby hasten the return of stabilized currencies, but we could restore the purchasing power of more than one half of the world that uses silver. This is extremely important to the people of the United States because the chief markets to which we must turn in the future must be China and India and other silver-using countries. When the purchasing power of their silver money is restored and placed on the same fair parity with gold, they will be glad to buy our products. The President in his message has promised us that he will propose some definite plan to aid in restoring the normal purchasing power of silver. If he does this a long step will have been taken in the direction of recovery. Many plans have been proposed to remonetize silver or restore it to the metallic reserves of the world. I shall not at this time discuss the merits of these respective plans. If we have the will to restore the purchasing power of silver, a way can be found without serious difficulty. Our committee has devoted exhaustive study to the question of silver, and I believe that a majority of the members on it are anxious to give to Congress and the country a practicable and workable silver bill at the earliest time.

Mr. SOMERS of New York. Mr. Chairman, I desire to yield to the gentleman from New Jersey 15 minutes of the time under my control and I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may, in turn, yield such time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that of the time allotted to him he may, in turn, yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey, to be used by the gentleman from New Jersey at his discretion. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. McGUGIN].

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, I listened with a great deal of interest to the remarks of the gentleman from Texas, in which he discussed the proposition that the British pound is driven down to a low level, while the American dollar is at a high level.

If he had made that speech a year ago, it would be in order, and I should be in accord with him. But let us take the facts as they are today.

The dollar is cheap and the pound is high, not the pound cheap and the dollar high. The normal exchange value between the dollar and the pound for the year was $4.86. Yesterday in the money markets of the world it required $5.02 of American money to buy a British pound. In other words, the American dollar was 16 cents below normal on the world exchange markets for a pound. Not 16 cents on the dollar but 16 cents on the pound. Today the American dollar ranks as one of the low-value currencies among standard currencies of the world.

It is with some humiliation that we must acknowledge today that the American dollar in exchange with the Canadian dollar, the premium is on the side of the Canadian dollar.

I am not in favor of a high-priced dollar. Today I am in favor of reducing the content of the gold dollar.

But when a gentleman stands on this floor and makes a speech that would have been appropriate a year ago, in which he undertakes to lead the House and the country to believe that today the American dollar is so high in price that we need a $2,000,000,000 equalization fund to beat down its value, I must refute such a statement. In doing so I am substantiated by the quotations of the money markets of the world as of yesterday and today.

Now, I wish to discuss this bill, if I may. In the first place, it is a very far-reaching bill. The devaluation of the value of the dollar or fixing the gold content of the dollar is the smallest part of this bill. The President's message and the newspaper reports which have gone out over the country would lead Congress and the country to believe that the bill is necessary to stabilize the value of the dollar. That is not true. The enactment of the bill does not stabilize the value of the dollar.

In the last special session Congress enacted the Thomas amendment, whereby the President was given power to reduce the content of the gold dollar, not to exceed 50 percent of its normal and present value. The President today by Executive order can reduce the content of the dollar to any point from its present weight of 23.22 grains, down to 11.61 grains.

This bill does not make him reduce it. All this bill does is to allow him to fix it between 50 and 60 percent of its present weight of 23.22 grains.

That he can do at any moment he chooses. Whatever the bill does, remember this: It does not fix the value of the gold dollar. The enactment of the bill does not change the situation, except that if the President chooses to fix the value he must fix it between 50 and 60 percent, which he is now permitted to do by Executive order, under the Thomas amendment.

The truth is that all this talk about stabilization of the dollar now is only to take advantage of the wide-spread public sentiment crying to high heaven for some sort of stabilization in the value of the dollar and wipe out the present fear and uncertainty. Taking advantage of that situation, the people are led to believe that we need some legislation by Congress in order to do that. We need nothing of the kind. The President can stabilize the dollar, under the Thomas amendment, by Executive order any moment he chooses. Such propaganda is put out to blind the Congress and the public to accept a bill here that carries many provisions that are far-reaching, and which are not even considered by the public at this time. All there is in the bill which pertains to fixing the value of the dollar is to be found in about seven lines in section 12, and section 12 does not fix the value.

We have had no fair chance to consider this bill in the committee. I have asked that we have time to call in various witnesses. There is nothing partisan about it. Two of the witnesses I wanted to call were Newton D. Baker, a former Democratic Secretary of War and a friend of this administration, and David Houston, a former Democratic Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. SOMERS of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGUGIN. Yes.

Mr. SOMERS of New York. Would the gentleman mind stating to the House that the chairman called every witness that the gentleman suggested?

Mr. McGUGIN. Yes.

Mr. SOMERS of New York. And personally telephoned to them.

Mr. McGUGIN. Yes. I am not saying that it was the fault of the chairman, but it is because the leadership of this House is trying to ramrod this bill through Congress before we could have sufficient time to bring in these witnesses I have mentioned and many other witnesses.

The Committee of the Nation sends a telegram this morning begging the opportunity to appear before the committee. The Committee of the Nation stands for devaluation. It is a friend of the principle held out as the fundamental principle of this bill, but which is not the fundamental principle of the bill. The fundamental principle involved in the bill is to create a $2,000,000,000 fund, to be placed in the hands of one man, whereby he can club up or club down not only the currency of the United States but the currency of any other country in the world. I say to you that neither the Congress nor the country would accept section 10 of this bill in its present form if it were standing out here on its own merits as a square-toed piece of legislation. The administration knows that neither the country nor the Congress would accept section 10 upon its merits alone. That is why this propaganda has been hailed to the country, that the primary purpose of this bill is stabilization, when it is not. That is a smoke screen while section 10 is being ramrodded through Congress without Congress knowing much about it and the public knowing less about it. I can say that and cannot be charged with being an enemy of the basic principle of devaluing the gold dollar, because my words are in perfect keeping with the words in this telegram from the Committee of the Nation which we received this morning, and which I now read:

> Regulating the purchasing power of our United States money imposed as a duty by the Constitution upon the Congress is the highest act of sovereignty. Permanent relinquishment of this function by Congress to one Cabinet member is so momentous a step that it should have full discussion before being taken.

This bill seeks to turn over the full control of the power of money into the hands of one man, the Secretary of the Treasury, not only this Secretary of the Treasury but all Secretaries of the Treasury which may come after him. The framers of the Constitution in their wisdom placed, not in the President of the United States, but in the Congress the power to coin money and regulate the value thereof. When we provide a $2,000,000,000 fund for the Secretary of the Treasury to use to beat up or down American money, to beat up or down the currency of all other countries of the world, we have placed into the hands of one man the economic destiny of 126,000,000 American people. In doing it we have betrayed our constitutional obligation to retain in the hands of Congress the power to control money. If section 10 were standing here as a free, independent piece of legislation on its own merits, the Congress would not dare turn the interests of all the people of this country over to the hands of one man. What is involved in this bill is section 10, and upon that section comes the wrath and the opposition of those who want devaluation of the dollar by those who still love and revere constitutional government in this country and who oppose placing that amount of power in one lone man.

Let me say to you Democrats who vote for this bill today thinking you are serving your party, in the nature of things, you will not always be in power, and if some day, some time, there is an Andrew Mellon or a Eugene Meyer as Secretary of the Treasury—two gentlemen particularly obnoxious to many Democrats—and if they use this power to drive down prices, the responsibility will rest upon you, you Members of Congress who sit here today and betray your constitutional obligation to retain in the hands of Congress the power to control money. Instead of doing that you are giving it to the Secretary of the Treasury in the form of permanent legislation which lasts as long as the Republic lasts, unless some other Congress in its wisdom undoes the wrong this Congress is about to do in the name of party loyalty or some other side issue. If, indeed, we need such a fund for an emergency, I say to you that there is no occasion for making it permanent legislation.

If it is to meet an emergency, then pass it as emergency legislation, with a time limit for that power. Another future Congress will love this country the same as we do, and if it be necessary to extend that power for a longer period of time, that Congress will meet that responsibility. Another Congress sat here 2 years ago and organized the Reconstruction Finance Corporation as an emergency measure. It limited the life of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to 2 years. It would have expired this month. This Congress extended the life of it because in its wisdom it deemed it advisable to do so.

Again we are told we must have this equalization fund of $2,000,000,000 because England has such a fund. Well, England at least has three men administering that fund. England does not place her destiny in the hands of the Chancellor of the Exchequer or any other one man. I say in all fairness, in all candor, the man does not live and the man never has lived in America or any other place in this world, in my judgment, who has the ability, single-handed and alone, to bear the responsibilities of handling a $2,000,000,000 fund, with the power to use it to fight all of the currencies of the world.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 additional minutes to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. FORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGUGIN. No; I cannot yield now.

We are going to offer an amendment later on, not for the purpose of strangling your President, not at all, but we shall offer an amendment providing that the duties here prescribed for the Secretary of the Treasury will be carried out by a board.

The membership of the board, under this amendment will be the President of the United States, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Governor of the Federal Reserve Board, and two other men whom the President of the United States may appoint, subject to confirmation by the United States Senate. That is not tying the hands of the administration. All it is doing is giving to the American people, in the administering of this fund, the wisdom of five men instead of the wisdom of one man. At least, we want somebody there who once in awhile may say, "Mr. Secretary, I believe that this which you are about to do might be a mistake." It is not right, it is not practical for this Congress to place in the hands of any one man such gigantic power over the American people. I am not even going to ask in that amendment that Mr. Roosevelt appoint from any party other than his own. I am not going to ask that he recognize my party. All we are asking is that these duties be performed by a board of five men, one of whom is the Secretary of the Treasury, the other the President himself, the other the Governor of the Federal Reserve Board, whom he himself chose, and two other men whom he may choose. The only possible restriction upon the President would be senatorial confirmation of two of the members, and is it possible that the United States Senate, nearly three fourths of which is Democratic, would unduly hamper the Democratic President in his appointment of two members to this board?

The first nine sections of this bill pertain to Federal Reserve gold. That Federal Reserve gold comes from various sources. Some of it was forced into the Federal Reserve as the result of the banking legislation passed last year. It was taken away from the people. Obviously, the last penny of that should go into the United States Treasury. There is some gold that belongs to the Federal Reserve, upon which it has its Federal Reserve notes issued, and those notes as currency are in the hands of the people. That part of the gold of the Federal Reserve against which currency is issued, in my judgment, should remain with the Federal Reserve, with this exception, that if the dollar is depreciated 40 percent, 40 percent of the amount of such gold that it has in its possession shall be taken into the Treasury of the United States. In other words, neither the Federal Reserve nor any individual should have any right whatever to make one penny of profit out of the devaluation of the gold dollar. But in my judgment, there should be enough gold left to the Federal Reserve to support the currency which it has issued, not as a special favor to the Federal Reserve banks, but in common duty, keeping a common trust with the millions of citizens of this country who have perchance Federal Reserve currencies in their pockets. However, the terms of the bill provide that after this gold is taken over, the Government guarantees equal parity between that Federal Reserve currency and all other currency. If that is carried out, probably it is not a serious matter. I am not here to combat the first nine sections of this bill. I believe that the greater part of that gold should come into the Government. I am not in favor of the Federal Reserve making a penny profit as a result of devaluation. I think the Federal Reserve should retain as much gold as it requires to support the money they have issued, under the new standard of value of the dollar. However, if all the currency is placed on a parity, as the bill promises, that may not be such a serious proposition. But the real serious thing in this bill is section 10, which is contrary to traditional Americanism. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has again expired.

Mr. SOMERS of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. SWANK].

Mr. SWANK. Mr. Chairman, on the 15th day of January 1934 the President of the United States sent a message to the House of Representatives recommending legislation to protect our currency system and to provide for the use of our monetary gold for the betterment of our citizens. In that message the President said:

> The issuance and control of the medium of exchange which we call "money" is a high prerogative of government. * * * Because they were scarce, because they could readily be subdivided and transported, gold and silver have been used either for money or as a basis for forms of money which in themselves had only nominal intrinsic value.
> In pure theory, of course, a government could issue mere tokens to serve as money—tokens which would be accepted at their face value if it were certain that the amount of these tokens were permanently limited and confined to the total amount necessary for the daily cash needs of the community. Because this assurance could not always or sufficiently be given, governments have found that reserves or bases of gold and silver behind their paper or token currency added stability to their financial systems.

The message further says:

> Free circulation of gold is unnecessary, leads to hoarding, and tends to the possible weakening of national financial structures in times of emergency.

The President asks specific enactment by Congress to vest in the United States title to all supplies of American-owned monetary gold, with provision for the payment in gold certificates. The President is now authorized to reduce the gold content of the dollar as much as 50 percent under the Thomas amendment to the Agricultural Adjustment Act of May 12, 1933, and he is asking authority to revalue the dollar at not more than 60 percent. Under this bill the weight of the gold dollar cannot be fixed at more than 60 percent of its present weight.

The Constitution of the United States provides that Congress shall have the power to coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin, and fix the standard of weights and measures. You will note this provision specifically reserves to Congress the right to "regulate the value" of money. I believe this bill is constitutional and valid.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. McGUGIN] in his address seemed to be greatly concerned with the authority which this bill vests in the handling of the stabilization fund, in the Secretary of the Treasury, who is under direct control and supervision of the President of the United States; but I might call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that from the 4th of March 1921 until the 4th of March 1933 not only the Treasury Department but the Government of the United States was under the control of one man, Andrew W. Mellon, and we have not heard very much from the gentleman's side of the House complaining about that.

Last November we changed that and took it out of the control of one man. The stabilization fund provided in this bill has to be administered by someone. In England the stabilization fund is administered not by three men but by two men, as the authorities before the committee testified; and no man knows how they administer it.

Under this or any other bill enacted, Congress has control at all times of the Secretary of the Treasury and the other Cabinet officers. Congress at any time can order an investigation, and upon proper cause can impeach any Cabinet officer and remove him. We must trust somebody. I do not believe this trust will be misplaced.

The bill H.R. 6976, introduced by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SOMERS], Chairman of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, is the bill that carries into effect the recommendations of the President's message referred to above. The bill provides for the restoration of a fairer price level, stabilizes the dollar, and will cause a reduction in our indebtedness.

Under the terms of the bill all gold coin and bullion shall pass to and be vested in the United States, and payment therefor will be made in gold certificates issued against this gold. The Federal Reserve Act is amended, so far as Federal Reserve notes are concerned, by striking out "gold" and inserting "lawful money", which makes these notes payable in any lawful money. The bill gives the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, power to issue regulations when needed in order to further carry out the purposes of the act. Provision is made that any gold that is withheld in violation of the act may be seized and condemned by the Government. Under the terms of the bill, all gold coin of the United States shall be withdrawn from circulation, and, with other gold owned by the United States, shall be made into bars of the weight and fineness directed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Statistics show that under the terms of the bill the Government will have title to about $4,500,000,000 in gold, and if the weight of the gold dollar is fixed at 50 percent of its present weight, this will increase the value of our gold by $4,500,000,000. This amount, in the sum of $9,000,000,000, will provide a basis, under the present law requiring a 40-percent gold reserve, for the issuance of $22,500,000,000 in sound currency.

If this bill is enacted into law and the President decides on a gold dollar of 60 percent of the present weight, this will mean that the gold dollar will contain 13.93 grains, whereas it now contains 23.22 grains. In other words, we would have a 60-cent dollar in comparison with the 23.22 grains in the present gold dollar. The new dollar would be worth 60 percent of that dollar. I believe everyone agrees that this bill will increase commodity prices, including farm products. It will increase the actual circulation of money and assist greatly in putting people to work.

The bill also provides for a stabilization fund of $2,000,000,000 for the purpose of stabilizing the value of the dollar.

Mr. Chairman, your Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures has held extensive hearings in the Seventy-second Congress and in the present Congress upon this question and has had a bill of this nature before it for consideration. We have heard many eminent authorities upon the money question. I am glad to be a member of this committee and to have a part in the preparation of this important legislation.

I believe this bill goes farther and is more far-reaching than any other bill that Congress has considered for many years. The President of the United States is to be congratulated by our entire citizenship upon his vision and forethought. He has gone farther than any other President in modern times toward removing the clutches of Wall Street and our international bankers from the medium of exchange. The greatest inaugural address I have ever heard or read since the days of George Washington was that delivered by the President on the east steps of the Capitol at his inauguration March 4, 1933. The President said:

> Practices of the unscrupulous money changers stand indicted in the court of public opinion, rejected by the hearts and minds of men.
> True, they have tried, but their efforts have been cast in the pattern of an outworn tradition. Faced by failure of credit, they have proposed only the lending of more money. Stripped of the lure of profit by which to induce our people to follow their false leadership, they have resorted to exhortations, pleading tearfully for restored confidence. They know only the rules of a generation of self-seekers. They have no vision, and when there is no vision the people perish.
> The money changers have fled from their high seats in the temple of our civilization. We may now restore that temple to the ancient truths. The measure of restoration lies in the extent to which we apply social values more noble than mere monetary profit.

Mr. Chairman, the first acts of the President were to put the people back to work and he now comes before us for enactment of the greatest declaration of monetary rights ever given to our citizenship. In his message of January 15, 1934, the President further says:

> Governments can well, as they have in the past, employ silver as a basis for currency, and I look for a greatly increased use. I am, however, withholding any recommendation to the Congress looking to further extension of the monetary use of silver, because I believe we should gain more knowledge of the results of the London agreement and of our other monetary measures.

This is a most sympathetic declaration on silver.

This action of the President is not a repudiation of any kind, but is even-handed justice to our people in general. The President speaks the language of the multitude and is easily understood. When he took the reins of government we were faced with destruction and needed leadership—a Moses to guide us through this period of depression and despair. That leadership appeared in the person of President Franklin D. Roosevelt, who has the ability, the leadership, and above all, the courage to resist the influence of the money changers in high places.

I believe this bill should be speedily enacted into law, as requested by the President, and I feel confident that in the near future it will be followed with an act for the remonetization of silver, whereby a prosperous trade will be opened between our country and the silver countries of the Orient. [Applause.]

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN].

Mr. MCFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, the bill we now have before us was drawn at the instance of the President of the United States. The bill has had very little if any detailed consideration in either of the two committees reporting it, and I recognize the fact that there is a lack of knowledge of this bill among the membership. It is the common remark in the corridors and cloakrooms—and has been for the last several days—that no one knows what is in this bill.

The bill is not so complicated. It has for its purpose that which the President aims to accomplish in dealing with the economic and financial situation in the United States—to bring conditions back to what he calls the 1926 price level; and in order to do that after having tried other methods he is proposing to lower the gold content of the dollar; and Congress at the last special session gave him this right.

There is no question but that the Congress of the United States has the sole power to deal with the question of the value of money, and in this particular instance we now here have the responsibility. The President has asked for definite proposals in this connection not only for reducing the gold content of the dollar but for dealing in gold and international exchanges for supporting the Government's credit through the use of the stabilization fund of $2,000,000,000 which is proposed to be created. There are embodied in this bill other provisions which give the Secretary of the Treasury certain rights he does not now have, and which he says are necessary in the issuance and sale of the large amount of Government securities which are going to be put on the market very shortly.

I may say to the membership of this House, particularly to some of the new Members, that I am not alarmed in regard to taking over the gold from the Federal Reserve banks into the Treasury of the United States; in fact, I have been advocating this on the floor of the House for the past several years.

I have before me now a speech I made on February 10, 1930, which has a bearing on this. I have before me here a speech I made on June 10, 1932, and from this speech I wish now to quote. I said:

> What is needed here is a return to the Constitution of the United States. We need to have a complete divorce of bank and state. The old struggle that was fought out here in Jackson's day must be fought over again. The independent United States Treasury should be reestablished and the Government should keep its own money under lock and key in the building the people provided for that purpose. Asset currency, the device of the swindler, should be done away with. The Government should buy gold and issue United States currency on it. The business of the independent bankers should be restored to them. The State banking systems should be freed from coercion. The Federal Reserve districts should be abolished and State boundaries should be respected. Bank reserves should be kept within the borders of the States whose people own them, and this reserve money of the people should be protected so that international bankers and acceptance bankers and discount dealers cannot draw it away from them. The exchanges should be closed while we are putting our financial affairs in order. The Federal Reserve Act should be repealed and the Federal Reserve banks, having violated their charters, should be liquidated immediately. Faithless Government officers who have violated their oaths of office should be impeached and brought to trial. Unless this is done by us, I predict that the American people, outraged, robbed, pillaged, insulted, and betrayed as they are in their own land, will rise in their wrath and send a President here who will sweep the money changers out of the temple. [Applause.]

Referring again to the Federal Reserve gold, my thought in that connection is that the gold taken away from the Federal Reserve banks is apparently to be replaced by some kind of Government obligation. The President's message indicated that it was to be a gold certificate. There is some doubt as to whether there is to be specifically set aside gold to redeem these to-be-issued gold certificates. This I regret; and I hope that, either by proclamation of the President or by amendment to this bill, the kind of security that is given to the Federal Reserve bank may be clarified. I mean by this is the to-be-issued gold certificate to be a gold certificate in name only, or will the United States redeem these gold certificates in actual gold on the new gold-dollar value?

There is no reason in the world why when we lower the gold content of the dollar this so-called "book profit" should remain in the custody and to the benefit of the Federal Reserve System. It belongs in the Treasury of the United States; and let me say that if you will examine the Federal Reserve law carefully, you will find that eventually or at liquidation all of the surplus assets and profits remaining in the Federal Reserve banks are to be returned to the United States Treasury. So, so far as that is concerned, there is much ado about nothing. I recognize, however, that the administration in taking some of the steps up to this point has paid little regard to the Constitution of the United States. In the early stages of this administration the President acted in contradiction, I believe, of the Constitution of the United States; but he sent in a bill which the membership of this House passed, ratifying those unconstitutional acts so far as the Membership here could ratify them.

There are some things in this bill that I am alarmed about—and they are serious—and may I point out to you gentlemen who have the responsibility on the majority side that you should give serious consideration before granting the authority which in this bill is being delegated to the present Secretary of the Treasury. You are creating a fund of $2,000,000,000 and placing it under the sole direction of this one man; and I am sorry to say that at this particular time I, as one member of the citizenry of this country, have not the confidence in the ability of this man to handle successfully on his own account the affairs of the United States Treasury. His experience and background do not qualify him for the things that are to be done now in the Treasury and with this stabilization fund. I want to suggest to you the importance of amending this bill—and I realize how hopeless it is for anyone who is not in the majority to offer an amendment in this respect—I want to suggest that you change the provision for yearly reports to monthly reports. If I had my way in this connection, I would say that these reports should be made to the Congress of the United States, to the Speaker of the House, and to the Vice President of the United States. The management of the proposed functions under this bill should never be left to any one man.

I want to point out here definitely, while I am on this subject, that the present Secretary of the Treasury is by family, tradition, neighbors, association, and friends tied in with the international Jewish financial group who are associated closely with the ruling financial officials of the British Government and the Bank of England at this time.

Above all, I want to clear in my own mind, and attempt to clarify in your minds, the question of stabilization. The lowering of the gold content of the dollar is not stabilization.

We can legislate until we are black in the face, and we will not be able to legislate stabilization.

Stabilization, as I understand it, is going to come subsequent to the passage of this act, if it comes at all. It is probably going to come about through an announcement from the President that we are now again on a gold basis—on a new gold basis; then the stabilization is going to come when there is worked out by the President of the United States, and I hope he will do this of his own volition, taking into consideration what is for the best interests of the 125,000,000 people in the United States, a plan whereby he will fix definitely the parity of our new dollar with the pound and the franc. I hope he will dominate the drafting of all bilateral treaties on this subject.

Those of us who have studied this parity of the dollar with other countries' money heretofore have recognized that there has been an unfair parity. This has resulted in our relations with Great Britain particularly, with her vast resources all over the world, having an advantage in settlements over the United States. This has cost us many hundreds of millions of dollars. So the important thing for the administration in this respect is to bring about stabilization of the right sort. I mean stabilize the dollar with the pound and the franc in such a way that the British will not have an opportunity to make out of the unfair parity millions of dollars at our expense; a parity that will not give France the opportunity and, if you please, that will not give the United States an opportunity to unfairly make money out of an unfair parity of our dollar as compared with the money of the other nations of the world. This is an important matter that is still to be determined.

In connection with this authority which we are granting, with the appropriation of $2,000,000,000, we are turning over to the Secretary of the Treasury the right to buy and sell foreign exchange. This means the right to deal in foreign bills which accumulate in international trade transactions.

It gives the Secretary of the Treasury authority to buy and sell gold on the international market. Above all, it gives him authority to buy and sell gold and Government securities. This is an authority, and I think I understand what is in the mind of the administration in that respect, which is fraught with much danger, if not the opportunity for downright dishonesty. We all know in the present situation, because of the great demands for money which have been made upon the Government up to this time, that it is issuing Government bonds in large quantities now. That they are maintaining what is known as a market now. That has been stated by the Secretary of the Treasury. They are using Government trust funds, like the Post Office funds, the employees' retirement fund, and Alien Property Custodian fund, in stabilizing Government bond prices. They are supporting the present prices on Government bonds lest the prices in the market go too low and thus destroy the market for Government bonds.

We have a fictitious Government-bond market today. This big fund, if it is used to further support the market on our own Government securities, will be used for the purpose of maintaining a fictitious market, and that, I submit, is a dishonest transaction. We must so conduct the affairs of our Treasury that this great Government of ours will not be under suspicion or its credit ever challenged. I shall regret the day when we give authority to the Secretary of the Treasury to buy and sell Government securities at par or below par. This is an authority which this Congress has never delegated to any one administrative officer heretofore; and it should not be done now, especially when this law makes him not accountable to any other administration officers for his decisions—not even to the President of the United States.

Those are the two great objections I have to this bill, and I think if you gentlemen who have the responsibility will look into this matter carefully you will cooperate in the amending of this bill to the extent of having a committee administer this stabilization fund.

There is another danger in delegating this power to the chief financial officer of the Government. He is an interested party. He should not participate in these transactions, which are independent of the Government's financial operations.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. I yield.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I should like to ask the gentleman if the passage of this bill is in any way tied up to the P.W.A. and the C.W.A. financing?

Mr. McFADDEN. I do not know. Of course, the funds that are furnished to those organizations to carry out their work come from Government bond issues and taxes. That is the only connection I see in any way, shape, or form.

There are certain statistics in connection with this matter, Mr. Chairman, that I should like the privilege of inserting. I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting them.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. DISNEY). Is there any objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. McFADDEN. Just a little detail here as regards what we are doing. On the basis of a 50-cent devaluation of the gold content of the dollar, which would make the price of gold $41.34, the dollar will have been depreciated 50 percent and inflated 50 percent. Do not overlook that fact. It is a 50 percent inflation.

The arithmetic of this is as follows: There are 480 grains of fine gold in one ounce. At a parity of the gold standard, that is, 480 grains of fine gold are priced by law at $0.0430625 for each grain of fine gold. Therefore, if you multiply 480 grains by $0.0430625 you will obtain the answer $20.67, which is the lawful fixed price of 1 ounce of fine gold (mint price). This price of $20.67 is the international parity of the gold-standard treaties which the two leading civilized white and Christian creditor nations of the world have denounced and abandoned all the principles thereof. If we depreciate by 50 percent the gold content of 1 ounce of fine gold lawfully priced at $20.67, the price of 1 ounce of fine gold is raised ipso facto to $41.34. Likewise the lawful price of 1 grain is raised from $0.0430625 to $0.0861250. If you multiply 23.22 grains, which is one gold dollar, by $0.0861250, you will obtain the answer $1.9999, which is really $2. If you multiply 113 grains, which is the number of grains contained in 1 English pound sterling, i.e., $4.866, by $0.086125, you will obtain the answer $9.732, which is exactly twice the value of the parity of $4.866.

To clarify, I am going to present a table to which I direct particular attention, which shows the different stages of devaluation of the gold from 100 to 50 and, likewise, its effect upon the pound sterling, which, of course, is the exchange with which we have the most to do.

Mr. PERKINS. I yield the gentleman from Pennsylvania 3 additional minutes.

Mr. McFADDEN. The matter just referred to is as follows:

Column 1: The average rate of exchange of the English pound sterling for the year 1923 through 1932.

Column 2: Value of United States imports from Great Britain for the year 1923 through 1932.

Column 3: Value of payments made each year by the United States to British shipping, insurance, and banking companies for services rendered in connection with the aggregate import and export trade of the United States throughout the world.

Column 4: Value of bills of exchange drawn on United States importers by exporters of foreign nations, which are debtors to Great Britain, bought in sterling by British banks operating throughout the world.

Column 5: Value of interest payments received as income on British capital invested in United States securities of every description, such as bonds, stocks, debentures, mortgages, etc., owned by British investors.

Column 6: Aggregate value of columns 2, 3, 4, and 5.

Column 7: Value of United States exports to Great Britain.

Column 8: Value of annual installments payable to U.S.A. Government on account of the British war debt in accordance with the terms and conditions set down in the Baldwin-Mellon agreement of March 1923.

Column 9: Aggregate value, after deduction of values contained in columns 7 and 8 from the values contained in column 6, which latter contains the aggregate values contained in columns 2, 3, 4, and 5. The marginal subdivisions marked "(A)", "(B)", and "(C)" in regard to column 9 show the degree of profit and/or purchasing power: (A) That was made on the gold standard; and (B) the profit, which includes the increased profit and/or purchasing power, that will be made in the future under a new gold standard; and (C) the net increased profit and/or purchasing power, which will accrue to Great Britain, provided that, as explained hereunder: 1. If and so long as the Government of the United States through the medium of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, continues to depreciate the value of the dollar by buying gold, at home and abroad, at variable premiums over the fixed gold standard price of $20.67 per ounce of fine gold. All the values contained in subdivision (B) are computed on the basis of gold being "pegged" by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation at $31.80 per ounce of fine gold of 480 grains; 2. If and when the Government of the United States should revalue gold, by an act of Congress and Senate, at the fixed price of $31.80 per ounce of 480 grains of fine gold. All values contained in this tabulation are computed on the basis of the volume and prices that obtained each year from 1923 through 1932 at the average rate of exchange of the pound sterling during each year.

Statement showing assessed gross income of Great Britain on declared overseas investments

[The income arising abroad to British investors for the purposes of the national income is divided into 3 groups]

Years	Group 1	Group 2	Group 3	Total gross income declared
	Dominion and foreign interest and dividends paid through paying agents in Great Britain, or received by the encashment of coupons through bankers, coupon dealers, etc., in Great Britain. This group refers to interest and dividends on Government securities issued by the British dominions and colonies, as well as by all foreign nations. All figures are in United States of America dollars computed at the average rate of exchange of the pound sterling during the year 1923 through 1932.	Income arising from businesses controlled in Great Britain, but mainly carried on abroad, and with assets situate abroad, interest, and dividends payable abroad (not included in group 1) and income from other foreign possessions. This group comprises (1) profits from certain concerns trading abroad and having assets abroad, viz: (a) Railways, tramways, etc., operating abroad; cables, telegraphs, and telephones situate abroad; (b) Mines, oil wells, and nitrate fields situate abroad; (c) Tea, coffee, rubber, sugar, etc., plantations situate abroad; (d) Gas, water, harbor, mortgage, financial, manufacturing, and trading undertakings abroad.	Income arising from trading corporations' operations carried on abroad by British concerns trading mainly at home, but partly abroad. This group embraces those concerns which, though carrying on trade abroad, have their main business at home. The principal concerns belonging to this group are shipping, banking, and insurance companies having branches abroad, and manufacturing and trading concerns with works or branches abroad. In considering the figures given in groups 2 and 3, it must be borne in mind that they are the income as declared for taxes payable in Great Britain and therefore must not be confused with the total receipts from overseas, whether profits or not, which are the figures of direct importance for the purpose of the international balance of payments.

NOTE.—These income returns are for the fiscal years ending Mar. 31.

Mr. McFADDEN. Now, we may as well recognize the fact that the action which we are taking here today largely takes the power over money and credit away from the Federal Reserve System. It is true, there are certain functions which will remain undisturbed, and one of the main functions is to act as a reservoir for reserve deposits of member banks which will carry with it the usual resources of rediscount. Just what is to be done with Federal Reserve note issues, whether the Federal Reserve System is to be given the continued right of issuing Federal Reserve notes and holding Government securities instead of gold, together with eligible paper, I do not know. I think, eventually, there must be some declaration on this subject, and I therefore look for additional revelations as to the unfolding of a further plan, and it is my judgment that we are not working on experiments, we are working under a definite plan which the President of the United States initiated when he was inducted into office, and each of these steps is a part of a definite plan to a definite end. Whether or not he succeeds in accomplishing what he has in mind is his responsibility.

I want to emphasize in closing that all the money and credit resources which we now possess come from prior-earned wealth, and all the wealth of the United States belongs to the United States, in the final analysis, as a collective American. Uncle Sam should be the beneficiary of his own wealth and any consequent credit manufactured out of it. If he were made the only banker—and there are some things that indicate this is a part of this program, and I am not in the confidence of the administration to that extent—all borrowers could take their collateral to him and borrow whatever passes for money, be it a token or what not; and when the people of the United States paid interest for the use of this money, credit, or tokens, it would go into the United States Treasury, where it would automatically stop the present Bolshevik threat; it would balance the Budget; it would pay the pensions and would abolish all property taxes. In other words, it would break the stranglehold and free the God that is in us, and would leave a yearly cash balance in the Treasury of the United States.

I am in favor of a return absolutely to the Constitution of the United States and am opposed to the setting up of any new form of government in these United States, because I am opposed to the establishment in this country of a ruling class and a peasant class. [Applause.]

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 5 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, this is a Franklin D. Roosevelt bill. He asked for it to enable him to continue his plan of recovery. He is going to get it. He asked for this on January 15, 5 days ago. You cannot find practically any opposition to his desire to revalue the gold dollar. There are not five men in this House who will dare to vote against the plan to revalue the gold dollar.

Our Republican friends must have something to say about the bill, and what do they do? They search around and some of them attack section 10. They scream with horror to think that you are going to put into the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury the power to handle this $2,000,000,000 stabilization fund. Why, the gentlemen on the other side have given the Secretary of the Treasury the power to handle fund after fund, buy and sell, and without the cooperation or supervision of any board, commission, or the approval of the President. You will recall he has the power to invest and reinvest the fund secured from the Alien Property Custodian, then there is the insurance fund of the Veterans' Administration and many others. You know that he handles this money, invests it, and reinvests it with no one telling him what to do with it. The Secretary does this under the power that you have granted him. Now you come along and say, "No; we will not give you the power to handle a few hundred million dollars more." What is a few hundred million dollars in these days? [Laughter.] When you talked about a few hundred million dollars years ago everybody would jump, but they pay no attention to it now. So do not get excited over the amount.

There is another thing the Republicans complain about—you are robbing the Federal Reserve banks by not giving them the profits, they say. My good friend from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] said this is confiscating their money.

What is the Federal Reserve bank? It was set up by an act of Congress and a Federal Reserve bank is supported by its member banks. Where do the member banks get their money? They get it from the depositors. Where did they get this gold? They got it from the depositors and passed it along and it came into the Federal Reserve banks. If the profits belong to anybody, they belong to the people who put the money in the banks, and how are you going to find out who put the money there. Therefore is it not proper that the Government should take over the profits for the benefit of all the people rather than for a few bankers? This is one time when Mr. Moneybags is going to be on the outside looking in and not on the inside looking out.

I was downstairs a few minutes ago and the teller in the Sergeant at Arms Office was playing with fifteen $20 gold pieces. He said one of the Members had turned them in. I asked him what he was going to do with the gold and he said he was going to take it up to one of the Washington national banks. That gold will then find its way into the Federal Reserve bank for the district and finally into the Treasury. What right has the Federal Reserve bank to get the benefit of any profits that might accrue from this gold turned in downstairs today by a Member of this House.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as I say, the President wants this bill. The Secretary of the Treasury told us why it is necessary. Many reasons were advanced by him why this bill should be passed at once. He gave one crude example of what we are up against. He said we are in a card game where all the players can cover up their cards, but Uncle Sam's cards must be turned face up on the table. What chance has Uncle Sam to deal with the other players when their cards are held up against their breasts and his cards are lying face up on the table? We want Uncle Sam's cards turned down so that they will not find out what we are doing, and this will give us the same opportunity that they have today. We should not want our officials to be handicapped in their dealings with others.

I say to you on the Democratic side that this is a Roosevelt measure. He wants this power. This is his bill. It comes from him; and whether our Republican friends like it or not, pass this bill as it comes from the committee, word for word, without changing any portion of it whatsoever, and you will be doing something to help the President of the United States bring about economic recovery. [Applause.]

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ANDREW].

Mr. ANDREW of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen, the bill before us today involves, in my judgment, some of the most fundamental decisions with regard to our monetary system that have faced Congress, certainly since the resumption of specie payment in the seventies, and probably since the very foundation of our Government.

Not only are we asked today to place the final seal of approval on the debasement of our gold coin but we are asked to abandon altogether the monetary system which has existed in this country since the beginning of its history, and to substitute for it permanently an irredeemable, inconvertible currency, depending for its amount and value only upon the fallible opinions of changing administrations.

We are asked to take this tremendous step 4 days after the bill was first presented to Congress with only 3 days' hearings, which are not yet available to Members of the House, and after merely 3 hours of explanation and discussion. If anyone thinks that is the way to create respect for Congress and the decisions of Congress and to reestablish faith in our monetary system, he must indeed be an optimist.

Let me enumerate some of the factors of instability which already exist in our monetary system. First of all our basic gold. I would not dwell upon the devaluation of the gold dollar, the power to do which was authorized last spring. I doubt whether at that time many Members of the House anticipated that that power would be used week after week during the following months deliberatively to bid down the value of our historic dollar. But that, as we know, has been done. It is an accomplished fact. And however serious or regrettable it may be, it is not as significant as the present proposition to abandon altogether a fixed though debased gold dollar as a standard.

Second. We also voted authority last spring to increase the Civil War greenbacks, now inconvertible again as they were in the sixties and seventies, from three hundred and forty-six millions to three thousand millions of dollars. That authority is still on the statute books, and there is nothing to prevent the Secretary of the Treasury from making use of it tomorrow if he chooses to do so. That is certainly not a factor which assists in restoring confidence.

Third. There is also still on the statute books power to issue, without any limitation whatever as to amount, Federal Reserve bank notes against Government obligations. I mean Federal Reserve bank notes, not Federal Reserve notes. The Secretary of the Treasury, when he wants to borrow, can sell United States bonds to the Federal Reserve banks and allow them to issue such notes dollar for dollar to pay for them. The law does not require any reserve to be held against them, but under the present proposal, which would make all currency irredeemable, it would mean little if it did. The Secretary of the Treasury, obliged as he is to borrow $10,000,000,000 within the next 5 months, could, under present law, do it through the medium of an issue of a like amount of inconvertible Federal Reserve bank notes.

This was the procedure which the German Government followed after the war. The Government sold its securities to the Reichsbank and allowed the Reichsbank to issue an equivalent sum of its notes.

In the end, as you perhaps remember, the German mark depreciated to less than one trillionth of its original gold value. That experience of 10 years ago is still so fresh in mind as not to permit a repetition of it on the same scale here or anywhere else in the world during the present generation. But the power still exists in this country to do so, and may be resorted to and, in fact, already has been used to some extent in recent months. The Secretary of the Treasury, in borrowing one or ten or more billions of dollars, is able to sell United States bonds to the Federal Reserve banks and arrange for these banks to issue a like amount of inconvertible paper currency. This is far from a reassuring factor in our present monetary system.

In the fourth place, the Executive last spring was given authority to buy any amounts of silver that he saw fit and to coin them at any fictitious value that he might choose. This power seems to me unimportant, however, as compared with the other powers that I have already mentioned, insofar as our currency is concerned, for the possible amounts involved are incomparably less than the Treasury's present power to issue paper money.

When Congress adjourned last June, there had been resigned to the Executive four grants of power with regard to our monetary system. First, he could debase the gold coins of half their value, issue two gold dollars in place of one, and so add four thousand million dollars to our monetary system. That is about to be done. Second, he could multiply the greenbacks eightfold, or up to three thousand millions of dollars. Third, he could force the issue of unlimited thousands of millions of Federal Reserve bank notes. Fourth, he could coin unlimited amounts of silver at the ratio to gold of 16 to 1, when its actual value in gold was less than 60 to 1.

The Executive has already used one of these grants of authority in debasing the gold dollar, thus adding, when the step is finally taken, four thousand millions of dollars to the country's total monetary stock of $10,000,000,000, an increase of 40 percent in the total money supply of the country. If this bill now before us had at the same time withdrawn or curtailed the other tremendous powers of inflation which Congress has authorized, it would have contributed vastly to the restoration of the country's confidence; but these other powers are not mentioned in the bill and still remain potentially disturbing. Instead, it is proposed today to give the Executive still further authority. The bill does not merely propose to remove every dollar of gold from the bank reserves but it proposes also to make all the various kinds of our paper money permanently irredeemable, that is, permanently insofar as one Congress can bind the future. Moreover, it still leaves in the hands of one man, the Secretary of the Treasury, the determination of how much inconvertible money shall be issued, and it gives him additional power to decide what its future value shall be.

Personally, I do not believe this is the road to recovery, or that it is a credit to the Congress of the United States to treat such a tremendously important subject with so little deliberation. [Applause.]

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, this bill to deflate the swollen value of the gold dollar to its original value is the first step in the redemption of the pledges of the Roosevelt administration for higher prices and an honest dollar. The manipulations of the money changers since the war have stretched the dollar until it is like a yardstick that has been doubled and tripled. It has been inflated until it is as dishonest as a bushel measure that has been enlarged to three times its honest capacity and as fraudulent as a pound scale weight plugged to weigh 3 pounds. When it buys a dozen eggs, it demands 36 eggs for the price of 12. When it buys a quart of milk, it exacts a gallon for the price of a quart. When it buys a beef, it takes the entire steer for the price of a hindquarter.

When a farmer takes a dollar's worth of corn to market, the dishonest gold dollar gives him 30 cents. When he buys a dollar's worth of farm machinery, it charges him $3. Where he once paid his taxes with a load of hogs, the double-dealing dollar now demands three loads of hogs. And when he goes to redeem his note, on which he borrowed $100, the pirate dollar strikes out the $100 worth of farm produce he borrowed and writes in $300 worth of farm produce to be paid.

This inflation of the dollar by the money powers has bankrupted millions, confiscated thousands of square miles of homes and farms, pauperized entire industries, fostered crime and poverty, marred the physical, mental, and social development of a generation of children, and reduced the standard of living of every farm family in America. The reduction of the dollar to its fair value under this bill will reduce debts and increase farm prices. It will reduce taxes and deficits and increase the farm income and the business and bank balance of every man dependent on farm patronage. It will cancel the advantage which European nations have been enjoying at our expense in international trade and will open to American commerce the markets of the world which England and France have closed to us by deflating the pound sterling and devaluing the franc while our misguided statesmen inflated the dollar and worshiped at the shrine of the gold standard as Israel worshiped the golden calf. When we can match their deflated currency with an equally deflated dollar, we can again export our surplus products to foreign markets, relieve the pressure on the market at home and maintain a fair domestic price. Our economic system will no longer be an autocracy of gold administered by a subservient Treasury Department under direction of metropolitan banks and international financiers but a democracy of stable and orderly values under which the producer will be accorded a fair market for his product and due compensation for his services.

But, Mr. Chairman, as important as this bill is, and as beneficial as the devaluation of the dollar will be to agriculture, it does not solve the problem of the farmer and it will not cure the depression. It is one of the fundamental measures with which President Roosevelt proposes to meet the existing emergency, and is a long step forward on the road to recovery, but it is only one step in the program. By itself it cannot remedy the basic cause of the depression which has pauperized agriculture, closed banks, shut down factories, and thrown millions out of employment. It fails to reach the major problem which must be solved before we can expect to return to normal. It does not remedy the inequitable distribution of the national income; the disparity in the wages paid for labor in the factory as compared with wages paid for the same labor in the field; the variation in the return on money invested in land and farming equipment and the same amount of money invested in industrial enterprises. It does not give agriculture the same price it pays industry and labor for the same amount of time and toil and investment. It does not afford the same compensation for commensurate service to society.

In the period immediately preceding and during the war, and again in 1926, agriculture enjoyed approximate parity with industry and labor, and the Nation prospered. Every man was employed and every tradesman was busy. But organized greed, its taste for blood aroused by unconscionable war profits, entered upon a campaign of legalized piracy. Farm prices were deflated while industrial prices were advanced beyond the peak prices of the war. In no previous age was the production and accumulation of wealth so rapid, and in no period of history since human slavery was abolished was its distribution so unfair to those who produced it.

In that short period more money was filched from agriculture than was exacted from the Central Powers in reparations at Versailles. Hogs sold at an all-time low level; wheat was lower than at any time since the reign of Queen Elizabeth; while farm machinery and fertilizer and practically every item entering into the cost of farm production reached the high-water mark in the quotations on the commodity exchanges of the Nation. For a time the market riggers fattened on the plunder from the farms as the Russian revolutionists gorged themselves with the loot from the stricken Russian nation. They thought they could live at the expense of the farmer indefinitely. But when the farmer could no longer buy, the factory could no longer sell. And when the factory could no longer sell, labor could no longer find employment. It was denying the farmer the return on his investment which industry asked on its investment that closed the factory and lowered its stocks and bonds on the exchange. It was denying the farmer the wage asked by labor for its services that reduced the union scale of wages and finally turned the workman out on the street. And the depression inevitably followed.

There can be no permanent employment until the factories are again running permanently, and the factories cannot operate permanently until the farmer can buy. The remedy is to restore the buying power of the farmer. Farm prices must be increased. There is no alternative. Wheat must again bring $1.50 per bushel; corn 75 cents per bushel; cotton 18 cents per pound; butter fat 35 cents per pound; hogs $12 a hundred; and all other farm products in proportion. These prices are low in comparison with $200 binders and $21.50 acid phosphate and the present price of motor gas.

The devaluation of the dollar will not remedy this discrepancy. The increase in the value of gold affects the price at which the farmer buys as well as the price at which he sells, and raising the price of both simultaneously is like a mechanical dog chasing a mechanical cat on a wheel. The faster the dog moves the faster the cat moves. The faster the farmer's income increases the faster his expenses increase. Raising both does not affect the margin between the two. It does not give the farmer parity in prices, and that is the sole objective to be achieved in ending the depression. Lack of parity of agricultural prices with industrial prices, the reduction of farm prices at a time when factory prices were skyrocketing above war levels, brought on the depression, and no amount of legislative or administrative palliatives will permanently end it. The farmer must again be paid as much as he is charged. Temporary expedients are narcotics; and unless the farm market for manufactured commodities is permanently opened by paying the farmer a price for farm commodities which will restore the buying power of the farm, business conditions will be worse when the effect of the artificial stimulant is dissipated than before the hypodermic was administered.

Devaluation of the dollar is merely a preliminary step. It will increase farm prices. But that is not sufficient. The increase must be to full parity with industry and labor. Legislation and administrative adjustments must be effected which will do for agriculture what the N.R.A. has done for industry. The N.R.A., as now administered, is largely neutralizing any advantage the farmer is receiving from remedial measures adopted for his relief up to this time. More than 300 codes have been adopted, creating monopolies and fixing prices which more than absorb the slight increases accruing from the subsidies being paid on farm products.

These monopolies created under Government supervision are mulcting the farm consumer out of all proportion to the increase in wages and employment afforded their employees. Cotton in the farmer's shirt went up 2 cents and the price charged the farmer went up 25 cents. Materials in his overalls went up less than 10 cents and the overalls went up from 49 cents to $1, an increase of over 100 percent. Wheat advanced 25 percent and concrete advanced 69 percent. The Government spent vast sums buying pigs, and hogs will today buy less manufactured commodities than ever before in the memory of this generation. The collusive prices adopted by the N.R.A. codes drove the pitiful purchasing power of the farmer from the index number of 71 in July 1933 to 57 in December 1933.

Basically, the N.R.A. is sound. But it should have followed and not preceded farm recovery. Industry has only suffered since 1929, while agriculture, with a brief respite in 1926, has been in deep water since 1921 and is going down for the third time. The remedy is to adopt measures which will advance farm prices to the parity which has been promised by every political platform since the war. Production must be controlled; tariffs must be reduced; negotiations must be entered into with foreign nations to lower trade barriers; foreign markets must be opened to surplus American products; prices must be advanced to parity and other means enlisted to place agriculture on a plane of economic equality with industry and labor.

In other words, the devaluation of the dollar must be supplemented. The economists who drew this bill must collaborate with Secretary Wallace to carry out the remainder of the program. No abler man has served as Secretary of Agriculture since the creation of that great office, and he and President Roosevelt are entitled to the cooperation and support of every official and citizen who looks forward to the coordination of industry, labor, and agriculture in the same mutually prosperous relationship they enjoyed in 1914, 1920, and 1926.

The depression is man made. It cannot be blamed on Providence. It is the product of greed and stupidity. It was brought about by legislative and economic manipulation, and it must be remedied through the same agencies. Legislation should be brought on the floor of the House as soon as the committees can report it to undo the evil which has been done and restore farm prices and national prosperity. The country has always enjoyed good times when the farmer was prosperous and bad times when he was denied a fair return for his labor, and it behooves the powers that be to take cognizance of that fact in the present emergency.

We are in the midst of a revolution. Old landmarks have been swept away and new standards are being established. It is a period of flux in which the status of the farmer is being permanently readjusted, and the justice and equity of that readjustment will affect profoundly not only the farmer but the economic life of the Nation and the world for centuries to come. Agriculture must have its fair share of the national wealth it creates. It is the cornerstone of our economic system, and the superstructure cannot stand on a crumbling foundation.

I am voting for this bill. I heartily endorse every provision in it. But additional legislation in behalf of agriculture must follow, and follow quickly, if recovery from the depression is to be permanent.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FIESINGER].

Mr. FIESINGER. Mr. Chairman, I rise to make an explanation of my vote on this bill, and in the limited time I have to make such explanation as I can. Of course, one cannot do very much in 10 minutes. It was said here this morning by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] that there are three major objectives in this bill—first, the devaluing of the gold dollar. This is sometimes called the revaluation of the gold ounce. This is a mistake. The ounce of gold is not changed in value. It is changed in price but not in value. This is an error that for us may prove to be a tragic blunder. England changed the value of the gold ounce by increasing the demand for gold. We can change the value of gold by decreasing the demand. But this bill does not do that, and there is our error. The next objective pertains to the changing of the Federal Reserve System. Such a matter we cannot even begin to consider in the time we have had allotted to us; and, third, the stabilization of the dollar. Without time for deliberate study, I must feel that I know nothing about the Federal Reserve System as its functions and ramifications relate to the proposed changes that are contained in this bill. We have had 72 hours to consider these various features. No one could hope to act as a legislator in that length of time if he is to function as a legislator in fact and not merely in form. In the few minutes allotted to me I shall address myself to the explanation that I have to make of the part of the bill which relates to the revaluation of the gold ounce. For years I have been studying the ramifications of this question. I have somewhat familiarized myself with its fallacies and its mysteries.

I have taken the position at least twice upon this floor that I am against devaluating the dollar. I have taken the floor several times in favor of America's assuming control of the value, not the price, of the gold ounce. About a year ago I made a speech on the floor of this House, and some gentleman asked me the question whether I was in favor of devaluing the dollar. I said that I was not, and on that occasion I gave my reasons. Within this bill is the power of the President to do as he sees fit within the limits fixed in the bill. I predict that these limitations will prove to be restrictions. I predict those who drafted this bill will later see that these restrictions play into the hand of nations who have refused to agree to the 1926 price level. I said on the floor of the House the other day I hope that the President of the United States, who has proposed this bill, has given these things serious consideration. The advisers of the President with whom I have conferred, or whom I have questioned as a member of the committee, have not satisfied me. I made a statement on the floor of the House the other day as to what might possibly happen if the Supreme Court of the United States should finally hold that the contracts that contain the gold clause, so called, should be carried out according to the provisions of the contract. Last evening there appeared in the Washington Star this statement by Dr. Warren M. Persons, whom Professor Fisher himself named as one of his approved 19 monetary experts. Among other things Dr. Persons is quoted to have said:

> The Government itself has issued about $20,000,000 in obligations which promise to pay in gold value then at $20.67 an ounce. If the price of gold is doubled through a 50-percent devaluation of the dollar, the Government would then owe $40,000,000,000 in the devalued dollar. That, of course, is predicated on the constitutionality of the gold clause.

There should, it seems to me, be some proper guaranties or some appropriate protection in the event the Government is caught short of gold either by such an event or some other event. For example, suppose the stabilization fund loses gold. Then the gold dollar is revalued again to adjust for error in this valuation. Suppose the corner on gold is broken and gold drops to the 1926 price level. What will we do. The Government will owe the Federal Reserve all the gold it has lost. Indications to the members of the committee were not to amend the President's bill. Therefore I will not offer an amendment, as I feel relieved from this responsibility; otherwise I would propose an amendment to protect the Government in such a situation by providing that the Government could pay in gold or in its value equivalent. I am going along with this bill, and I am going to vote for this bill. I hope the President has fully considered these things, and has determined what can be done to protect the Nation from such situations if they should arise.

What are we trying to do by devaluation of the gold dollar? Gold has risen in value, so that it has a purchasing power of about 165 percent or 170 percent, and we are supposed to be trying to take that excess purchasing power out of gold and bring gold back again to the normal value of the 1926 price level.

All the arguments that we hear speak of their changing the value of the gold ounce. It is said that we change the value of gold from $20.67 an ounce to $34 an ounce. These fallacies of expression have lead to fallacies of thought, and I am thoroughly concerned with them. You can change the price of an ounce of gold by dividing it into 34 fractional parts instead of 20 fractional parts, but you cannot change its value. We must make the distinction between value and price. You may pay $5 for a hat or you may pay 20 quarter dollars for a hat. You pay more units but you do not pay greater value, and this is exactly what happens when you change the gold content of the dollar. Let us consider the position of price in England. England has abandoned the gold redemption for the pound, and in that sense has devalued the gold content, but what did England do before that? England exercised control of the value of gold as to its purchasing power. England reduced the gold equivalent of sterling about 30 percent after England had increased the buying power of gold 65 percent. What is the result of this? The result is that although England has devalued the gold equivalent of her currency, England has fully protected her values.

Why is it this matter is overlooked by the American experts? I can get no satisfactory answer from them. The American Nation is considering the devaluation of the gold dollar before they have taken control of the value of the metal—gold—and given it the purchasing power that will suit American interests after the dollar is devalued. On the contrary the value of gold is in such a position as is against the interest of America as a great producing nation. So that we will lose each year by the lower values we will receive for our commodities and for our exports and for our property, a value that will be measured in staggering billions of dollars. This is not a theory. This is not an opinion. This is a fact. We may get more dollars and yet get less value.

The reason this distinction is overlooked is that the interest of America and the interest of Europe are not identical in the matter of values. Europe is interested in low values; America is interested in high values. There is much propaganda to the contrary, but I have spent months of study on this question. This propaganda is a sham and will not stand up. There is a definite conflict. It runs through the records, through parliamentary debates, and especially through the divisions in international conferences.

Mr. Chairman, I am saying that England before devaluing the gold content 30 percent raised the value of gold 60 percent and left the devalued currency of England still 30 percent above the 1926 price level, which meant that the price of commodities were 30 percent below the 1926 price level in terms of English exchange. On the contrary, America is devaluing the gold content of the dollar with gold 60 percent above the 1926 price level, which means that as soon as the corner of gold is broken, which is the object of all these nations, and as soon as gold has adjusted itself to the conditions that will follow, we will have a dollar value of 20 to 30 percent below the value we think we are arriving at in this bill, and we have fixed the limit that the President cannot go above to readjust for this. The result will be that we will be selling our products in the markets of the world at below the cost of production. We will be tied to the limitations of this bill, which is fixed between 50 and 60 percent, and what I am fearful of is that we will be tied by international agreement to stabilize the dollar in relation to the pound, and that will still further complicate our situation adverse to our interest.

I proposed a bill in this House more than a year ago, but it has not yet come up for debate, to do for America what England and France have done in their interest. And I would use the same principles. I recognize that gold has extreme value, and that all commodities and property have a correspondingly low value in relation to gold value. I would take that extreme value out of gold by putting in reserves another metallic money that would operate in competition with gold, and bring down the value of gold just as France and England have brought it up by the reverse process, and to where it normally ought to be. I would work with the law of supply and demand just as England has done, and I would leave gold with its purchasing power in line with the 1926 price level. Economists agree that this is the fair price level and that it protects American interests far better than either the price level of English sterling or the present value of gold. I have said many times that I have no personal interest in either gold or silver money. Why would I do it that way? Because if we did it that way we would be reducing the buying power value of gold money throughout the world. Gold as a world commodity would serve again as money and be then reestablished as a standard under a new system that protects business from this change. I would reduce the value of that gold over all the world and thereby raise the price of commodities over all the world in terms of all gold moneys. This is the real object. This is what we are after. This is a full protection to American economic interest. When we export prime commodities, we come in competition with other commodities throughout the world, and we would get for those commodities a purchasing power equal to the 1926 price level. Then our home market would give not only price but value. We would not only have more dollars but greater value per dollar.

We have been confronted here for 10 or 15 years with the farm problem. Why do we have the farm problem? Because we have to sell our exportable surplus in world markets. We are in competition with the same commodities over all the world, and we must meet their level of prices; and in meeting that level of prices, it reflects back upon the bulk of commodities that we sell in the United States. Hence, it we have to sell wheat in Liverpool at 50 cents a bushel, that price is reflected back in the United States. So what we want to do, if we are ever going to solve this problem, is to see that the price of wheat in Liverpool is raised. Then our price for wheat in this country will be raised, and we can solve the farm problem in this country. This is one procedure. The other is to plow up wheat and cotton and destroy our supply source of our national wealth.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FIESINGER] has expired.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 3 additional minutes.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIESINGER. I yield.

Mr. MAY. When I first came in the gentleman was talking about having heretofore opposed deflation of the dollar upon the idea that it might create fear in the minds of the people. Does not the gentleman feel that the provision in this bill, which provides for a $2,000,000,000 stabilization fund, will take care of the question of fear, as far as the markets are concerned?

Mr. FIESINGER. It might. I said I knew nothing about the stabilization fund. I have not had time to consider it in its various ramifications.

Now, I had in mind to submit an amendment to this House to cover the proposition that I am speaking about, but I knew before I introduced it that it would have no chance to pass here. This House is going to pass this bill, and I am going to vote for it [applause], but I say that cutting the dollar in two is not the cure. I say the cure is to put another substance in the world's metallic base to bring down the value of gold throughout the world, by adding to the gold equivalents of the world's money. However, I want to be on record here so that I am not reversing myself upon a position I have taken in this House. The amendment that I would offer would read as follows:

The Secretary of the Treasury is directed to provide a monetary reserve for the Treasury of the United States of both gold and silver. He shall purchase gold, as otherwise provided in this act, and shall purchase silver until a billion ounces of silver shall be added to the monetary reserves in the United States, at the rate of not less than 50,000,000 ounces per month: Provided, however, That as soon as 371¼ grains of fine silver shall equal 23.22 grains of pure gold in purchasing power the purchase of silver shall be suspended. The purchase of silver shall be made from time to time wherever silver shall be procurable at or under this value, and the silver so purchased shall be held in reserve in the Treasury of the United States against bearer certificates of deposit, payable to bearer on demand in silver bullion in an amount equal to the gold value of the face of the certificate.

Such silver certificates shall be issued by the Treasury in amount which, in the aggregate, shall equal the cost of such silver to the Treasury.

The Treasurer of the United States, upon presentation, shall redeem such silver certificates by the delivery of the face value thereof in silver bullion of the gold equivalent value, so that the silver delivered shall be measured by value rather than by weight.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FIESINGER] has expired.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. SMITH].

CONGRESS MUST RESTORE SILVER

Mr. SMITH of Washington. Mr. Chairman, may I express my personal gratification that this most important measure was referred by the Speaker of this House to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, in accord with the precedents and rulings of the distinguished Speakers of past Congresses, a decision which received almost unanimous approbation of the Membership of this body. We realize, of course, that some pretext could very easily have been assigned for referring it to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and such is the esteem and regard in which our present beloved Speaker is held, that if he had made such a ruling it also would undoubtedly have been upheld by the House. However, Speaker RAINEY again gave that evidence of his devotion to duty and right which have ever characterized his 30 years of faithful and valiant service to the cause of progressive government as a Member of the American Congress. The Speakership of this body is the second highest and important office in the Nation, ranking only next to the Presidency itself, and the American people are fortunate, indeed, that in this hour of crisis each of these exalted positions is held by an American statesman of courage, independence, vision, and patriotism.

Mr. Chairman, the action of President Roosevelt in ratifying the London silver pact and more recently to nationalize the gold coin and bullion in the possession of the Federal Reserve banks and to devalue the gold dollar on a basis of 60 percent of its statutory value, as is proposed in the pending bill, has raised the hopes of millions of our citizens throughout the land that before the end of this session the President will recommend to Congress the enactment of constructive silver legislation. Public opinion has crystallized rapidly in favor of the restoration of silver as a medium of exchange until today the vast majority of the American people from ocean to ocean are anxiously and eagerly looking to the President and Congress to bring about the increased employment of silver and a gold and silver standard of money, the monetary base upon which the United States was founded and continued until 1873. There is a pronounced public sentiment in favor of this policy in the State of Washington, particularly within my own district in southwest Washington, and it prevails to a marked degree in every section of the United States.

The American people everywhere have become convinced that the single gold standard is one of the principal causes of our present economic conditions. In their opinion this contraction and deflation of the currency has cheapened the prices of commodities, farm products, and all classes of merchandise, has decreased purchasing power, lowered property values, penalized debtors, enabled the big bankers to control and manipulate the money of the Nation to their own enrichment and the impoverishment of the wage earners, the farmers, the merchants, the professional men, and the population generally, and ruined our export trade with half the world.

GOLD DEVALUATION IS SOUND

Mr. Chairman and members of the Committee, this legislation to devalue the gold dollar will to some extent raise commodity prices, equalize debts, restore property values, and increase purchasing power, but unfortunately it will maintain and prolong the inability of China, India, Australia, South America, Mexico, and other silver-using nations of the world to buy our agricultural, forest, and other products. These nations who use silver money exclusively in their domestic trade, who constitute half of the population of the world, will still be compelled to buy gold exchange in all their foreign-trade transactions, materially reducing—in most cases as much as four times—their buying power, so that they cannot afford to buy from us. We will still be in the position of having one half of the gold of the world in our Treasury and yet require these nations, whose only money is silver, if they desire to purchase our products, to make payment therefor in gold.

RATIFICATION OF SILVER PACT INSUFFICIENT

The terms of the London silver pact stabilizing the domestic price of silver at 64½ cents per ounce, precluding the debasement of silver, limiting its sale and prescribing its purchase in the various nations, is not sufficient to bring about that far-reaching and wide-spread use of silver which is necessary to raise its value to a figure that will restore the purchasing power and prosperity of the silver-using nations and again open their markets to us and the rest of the world. Also, we will directly benefit very slightly the people of the silver-producing States within our own country, for we agree to take from the mines annually only 24,421,410 ounces of silver, during the period from January 1, 1934, to January 1, 1938, while the production in the United States for 1932 was approximately 24,000,000 ounces of silver, substantially the same quantity. On the contrary, by stabilizing the price of gold and silver in their proper relation, the metal-producing States would immediately start to absorb their own available labor and purchase materials and supplies from other States, in addition to increasing the value of the money of 800,000,000 people in the world who now use and always have used silver exclusively as their money and who would like to buy our wheat, our cotton, our lumber, our salmon, and our manufactured goods but cannot do so because their silver money, as now measured by gold, is nearly worthless.

SILVER MUST BE RESTORED

Mr. Chairman and my colleagues, why do we hesitate to do the two things that are absolutely essential?

First. Restore silver as a primary money metal, which it was throughout the world until 1873.

Second. Stabilize the price or value of silver in buying-power terms of an ounce of silver in the proper economic relation to gold.

The devaluation of the gold dollar by our Government, highly desirable as such action is in many respects, will not sufficiently enhance and stabilize the price and value of silver, which is proven by the fact that England, France, Italy, Holland, Norway, Sweden, and almost every country in Europe have long since gone off the gold standard and readjusted the value of their monetary units in terms of gold—their francs, pounds, lire, kroner, and what not—as we are about to do with the dollar, and yet no enhancement and stabilization of silver has resulted, nor will it result, from the devaluation of the gold content of our dollar.

We know that a considerable number of the Members of the United States Senate, probably a majority of the Membership, are in favor of restoring silver to its status as primary money on a parity with gold at a regulated ratio. It is generally considered that this senatorial group would be willing to agree to a 20-to-1 ratio, which is the figure being seriously considered by Great Britain. It is believed that it would be easier to obtain an international agreement at this ratio, as then the European powers would not have to restore all the parity that they clandestinely filched from the American and Asiatic nations through "the crime of '73."

UNITED STATES IN POSITION TO ACT

However, the United States, as the major world power and the leading creditor Nation in the world, is now in a position to settle its own monetary problems without taking dictation from the international bankers or our debtor governments of Europe, and there is every reason to assume that our taking action to establish silver as a primary redemption money on a parity with gold at a regulated ratio would be followed by similar action by every nation in the world with which the United States carries on commercial relations.

OBJECTIONS TO SILVER ARE UNFOUNDED

Mr. Chairman, who are those who object most strenuously to our taking this action? First and foremost, the international bankers and the possessors of great wealth in cash, gold bonds, and securities, who desire the purchasing power of gold to be high, commodity prices low, and the quantity of metallic money small, because the more limited the circulating medium of exchange, the more easily they can control and manipulate it for their own profit. They are those who have the brazen effrontery to compare the use of silver, which with gold has been used as a money metal from the dawn of civilization, and enjoyed a comparatively constant parity with gold up to the attempted demonetization of silver by Great Britain in 1816 and the United States in 1873, with German paper marks, which had back of them no redemption metal whatsoever, neither silver nor gold, and were in truth and in fact flat money, with nothing back of them excepting the mere promise of a bankrupt government.

The cry of "inflation" is another petty ruse to which the international bankers resort in the hope to thereby excite the fears of the people and create, if possible, prejudice against silver. They never tell the people that the Federal Reserve banks have issued billions of paper currency redeemable in silver, as well as gold, but based solely on the notes and commercial paper "promises to pay" of individuals and corporations, which, unlike silver and gold, are unlimited and the currency based thereon unlimited.

PRESENT GOLD SUPPLY INADEQUATE

Mr. Chairman and ladies and gentlemen of the Committee, every student of the subject agrees that the present gold supply is inadequate to serve the needs of the world for monetary purposes. The production of gold has declined 13 percent during the period from 1906 to 1932, according to the annual report of the Director of the Mint for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1932, while the population, business, and commerce of the world has increased at even a higher percentage than the production of gold has decreased, and on June 30, 1932, there was less than $6 of gold per capita for the world's population. The world's current obligations payable in gold exceed the total supply of gold in a ratio of 75 to 1. The total available supply of gold is not sufficient to pay even one half of the annual interest charge upon this debt. The principal of the debt accumulates three times as rapidly every year as the amount of gold mined annually for coinage purposes.

UNITED STATES WOULD NOT BE FLOODED WITH SILVER

Mr. Chairman, it is said that if we stabilize the value and price of silver as a primary money and broaden the metallic base of our monetary standard to include silver in a regulated ratio to gold in its true economic relation, so that the price of silver is thereby enhanced in the world markets, the United States will be flooded with silver; but where is it to come from? There are less than 4,000,000,000 ounces of silver coin and bullion in the whole world. Is it reasonable to suppose that those whose money for the past 5,000 years has been silver are going to get rid of it? Why did they not do so before when we had bimetallism? The records show that they increased their holdings of silver during that period.

We are now a creditor instead of a debtor Nation, the tide of exchange has turned, and these nations owe us approximately $4,000,000,000. If this were not true and all of the available silver did come into the United States Treasury, it was established by the Somers congressional committee, after an exhaustive investigation in 1932–33, that approximately 600,000,000 ounces of silver would be the absolute maximum figure that is available and could be brought in. It is at once apparent that this would have very little influence as against the gold now in the United States, especially when the new price is considered. If this be true, then only two other things could happen: First, they could return the certificates to the United States Treasury and demand their silver back, in which case we would lose nothing but the bookkeeping cost of the transaction; second, they could buy goods in the United States with the certificates, in which case our foreign trade would be increased to that extent with the silver-producing nations, and thereby further raise our commodity prices. In short, the only flood that the United States need fear is a flood of orders for American products. Assuming that every nation is going to dump its money upon us, would that not come through the purchases of our products, and is that not what we want?

HAS THE GOLD STANDARD FAILED?

Mr. Chairman, if the single gold standard, unsupported by silver, is so beneficial and is perfect, why do we have our present economic conditions? If gold, and gold alone, is the one and only proper monetary standard, why are all the nations of the earth abandoning it?

It is too obvious for serious argument that in view of the phenomenal volume of production and the overabundance of food, clothing, and every article and commodity for human sustenance, comfort, and even luxury, the fact that the greater portion of mankind are suffering for lack of those very things which are so plentiful must be due to an inadequate and insufficient medium for their proper and necessary exchange and distribution.

As for the United States, "our forests would build homes for the world to live in. Our coal would run its machinery, warm its firesides, and cook its food. Our lead, iron, copper, and zinc would supply its furnaces. Our granite and marble would build its temples."

DUTY OF CONGRESS TO ACT

The Constitution imposes upon Congress the duty to "coin money and regulate the value thereof." We cannot escape our duty if we would, and we would not do so if we could. Various forms of silver legislation have been proposed and are now pending before Congress. In this body we have the bills of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FIESINGER], the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CROSS], and in the Senate the bill sponsored by Senator WHEELER, of Montana. Symmetalism is being earnestly advocated in and out of the Chambers of Congress—a gold-silver dollar to be issued after there has been impounded in the United States Treasury all the silver coin and bullion, the same as the gold, with a view to definitely stabilizing both metals as the monetary base for a symmetallic dollar. Whichever one of these or some other form our silver legislation finally assumed, it will, I repeat, soon gain acceptance throughout Europe, and like recognition will be granted to silver by those nations, in the interest of their own commerce with the Far East and South America. In the United States definite salutary effects would be certain to ensue.

BENEFITS TO THE UNITED STATES

Millions of our workmen would be placed back in the ranks of the employed. It will do for the silver-producing States of Colorado, Wyoming, Montana, New Mexico, Washington, Oregon, California, Arizona, Idaho, Utah, Nevada, Illinois, Michigan, Missouri, North Carolina, Pennsylvania, Tennessee, Texas, and Vermont what the cotton, wheat, corn, and hog programs are intended to accomplish for the States producing those commodities and is an essential part of the whole recovery program.

Business within the United States would be stimulated, particularly in the silver-producing States named, and in other States from which materials and supplies would be purchased, and principally because of the impetus to business which would result from our increased commerce with the silver-using countries of Asia and Latin America, which would also multiply the income of our farming population, laboring men, merchants, and manufacturers.

My colleagues, a rich reward awaits the United States if we will but take the initiative in actually restoring the depreciated value of silver throughout the world, for we will thus immediately capture the trade and good will of the whole eastern world, whose restored enormous buying power would be diverted to our country and revive our industries and commerce. Altruism joins with statesmanship in appealing to us to act. Unrest, turmoil, and chaos are cursing China and India, threatening the peace of the world, the sinister figure of bolshevism lurking in the background, due to the almost worthless trade value of their silver money.

The nation which leads the world in substantially restoring the price and value of silver will render the greatest possible service to these miserable, unhappy teeming millions of the Far East; indeed, to the people of all lands, for if China and India are engulfed by bolshevism, revolution, and anarchy our Caucasian civilization will eventually be threatened, involving the fate and destiny of Europe and ultimately of America. Let us make no mistake about that. The nation that leads the way in restoring the economic equilibrium of the 800,000,000 inhabitants of the Far East will earn the everlasting gratitude of mankind; and I covet that honor and high place in history for the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SADOWSKI].

Mr. SADOWSKI. Mr. Chairman, I am very much in favor of this bill, and I shall vote for it. This bill carries out the recommendations of the President of the United States in his message to Congress on January 15, 1934. It provides for permanent metallic reserves under the absolute control and possession of the Federal Government. It gives the United States Treasury possession of all monetary gold stock—transferring to the United States Treasury all gold that is now held by the Federal Reserve bank. It further provides for the establishment of a $2,000,000,000 stabilization fund to protect our currency and to aid in the control of our price level. Due to our appreciated dollar and the depreciated currencies of other nations, we have suffered a tremendous disadvantage in the markets of the world. Our citizens have been driven to bankruptcy and suicide because they have been unable to pay debts that were accumulated when money was cheap. I believe that the restoration of the normal purchasing power of our dollar will lead to the restoration of normal business in commerce, agriculture, and industry. No creditor is entitled to a dollar that will purchase more than the one he loaned. This bill gives back to the people of America the right to control their own currency. We have been slaves and gold was our master. We shall now make gold our servant.

Those who controlled our gold have impoverished our citizens, confiscated their homes, closed our factories, wrecked our banks, and forced God-fearing, honest American citizens into bread lines to beg for a bite to eat. They have used this control over gold to gather unto themselves the real wealth of this Nation and pauperize and make serfs of our citizens. They produce nothing and absorb everything.

Oh, I wish this bill went further, so that not only would we have control of our currency but also complete ownership of our banking system. This bill is a step in the right direction, but I am not misled into the belief that it will cure all of our monetary troubles. This can never be done as long as we have privately owned banks in this Nation. The banking business should be nationalized, or socialized, if you please. They should be owned and operated by the Federal Government!

I should like to see the interest-paying game taken away from private bankers. I cannot understand why bankers, who do not own the money they lend, have a right to charge interest, or toll, on the use of money. It is this interest, or toll, that robs the manufacturer and merchant of their profit and the laborer of his wage.

It is like the rake-off, or the percentage in a crap game. When the game is played long enough the house has it all. There is no reason why the money masters, the private bankers, who produce nothing, are overloaded with wealth and power, while the good American citizen, who produces everything, is reduced to beggary. Take away their banking privilege, take away their right to charge a toll on the producers of this country, exterminate that parasite called interest! Then we will have solved our troubles. Then, and only then, will you have honest distribution of wealth.

We have an annual business of approximately $100,000,000,000 and have had only $5,000,000,000 to do the work. This puts a tremendous premium on money and gives to those who own it control of industries and trade generally, through loans upon which interest must be paid. Before the wheels of industry can be started, before manufacturers can open their factories, before constructors can erect new buildings, before real estate can be improved, money must be borrowed for the purpose and interest must be paid for the use of it. And please remember that this money has no value whatsoever except that granted by the people through acceptance as a trade convenience.

So I do not believe that the passage of this bill, although I am for it 100 percent, will cure our ills.

I believe that we must abolish interest and all other forms of payment for the use of money. Private banking must be prohibited! Control and supervision of money must be by the Government, who will operate all banks and other financial institutions—giving easy and liberal credit to its citizens and not charge a toll or a tribute therefor.

There is approximately $400,000,000,000 of wealth in our country. We all know that there is something radically wrong with our present system of distribution of wealth.

We feel that the more wealth produced, the more wealth there should be for everybody, providing it is honestly distributed. We know that new machinery, new inventions, producing a great deal of wealth with less labor required, are a blessing if the benefits were honestly distributed. We have asked ourselves this question many times: "How can we correct our present system of distribution of wealth so that it would operate on an honest and equitable basis?" My answer is: That because of the fact that modern production is made possible, to a large extent, through a system of credit, which at present is governed by those who control the supply of money and our banking houses, honest distribution of wealth cannot be accomplished, until the Federal Government has complete control of currency and banking. Not until we correct a system which gives credit only to those who will pay interest for it and who have wealth to pledge as security.

This bill does, Mr. Chairman, give the Secretary of the Treasury rights to perform certain banking functions, regarding drafts, checks, bills of exchange, bonds, notes, acceptances, foreign exchange, and so forth. This makes the Treasury a sort of central national bank. But it does not eliminate the Federal Reserve bank, and therefore we can expect continual conflict because these organizations will not be able to function side by side. It is my judgment that the Federal Reserve bank is unnecessary. It is privately owned and privately operated. The Government has permitted the Federal Reserve System to buy interest-bearing bonds with non-interest-bearing currency, made legal because the Government delegated its sovereignty to private bankers, the Federal Reserve System.

The Federal Reserve promised to the people of this Nation an even and proper flow of bank credit and an adequate currency. It has done neither.

The Federal Reserve should be abolished—all private banking should be abolished. The right to issue money and credit should be returned to the Federal Government. We must create a national Federal banking system, owned and operated exclusively by all the people of this Nation, for the benefit of all the people of the Nation.

I have been working on and hope to introduce to this Congress within a short time a measure which will accomplish just this very thing. It will be known as the bill "Establishing the bank of the United States, owned, operated, and controlled by the Government of the United States."

When this bill becomes a law there will be no more bank failures, the depositors will not lose their life's savings, the private bankers will be unable to use the people's money for gambling and wild speculation.

Michigan and other parts of the country will never again go through a banking calamity as we have witnessed recently. We have had a bitter experience. This is not the time to patch up our private banking system and adjourn in the hope that our bankers will have a change of heart, that they will improve, that they will become more honest and more sensitive of the obligations that they owe to the people. At this time it is our solemn duty to the people that have gone through untold misery to correct the greatest of all mistakes—a mistake that every previous Congress is responsible for because they had permitted and perpetuated a private banking and privately controlled currency system in this Nation.

I sincerely hope that I may have the united support of the Members of this Congress when this bill comes up for a vote.

Before voting on this bill, Mr. Chairman, may I bring to the attention of this House that a great deal of credit for this measure is due to that great crusader, that great friend of the common people, the Reverend Father Charles E. Coughlin, pastor of the Shrine of the Little Flower, from my own State of Michigan. He is a loyal friend of our President, Franklin D. Roosevelt. He has spoken over the radio many times appealing directly to the American people, educating them, giving them information which they would not receive from the press. He has fought the money changers and banksters relentlessly. He gave them no quarter. I believe that today, in the passage of this bill, the banksters and the money changers are on their way out.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH].

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I have been waiting for an explanation of this bill, a somewhat comprehensive explanation of it from some one of its supporters. I have not heard it as yet. I hope the House will have the benefit of such an explanation before the debate closes.

It is very difficult for a Member of the House little trained in financial subjects, for a Member who has never had any contact whatsoever with the intricacies of foreign exchange and bills, buying of dollars, selling of sterling, and all these mysterious international financial transactions with which the average man never comes into contact—it is difficult, I say, for him to project his mind toward the future and understand what this bill is actually going to do to the business of the United States, both domestic and foreign. To my mind it is highly unfortunate that the committee has not been permitted to hold anything like adequate hearings. It is a great pity we have not before us a volume of printed testimony containing the suggestions and advice, either for or against the principles involved in this bill, of men who have spent their lives studying these questions. I do not think I am reflecting upon the intelligence of the House when I say that scarcely any of us have ever had an opportunity to study these things, and thus scarcely any of us know much about the subject. I am more than willing to include myself in this category. In what I shall say this afternoon you will note that I am groping, groping in part for information, groping in part for solutions.

I shall not repeat the arguments uttered against the famous section 10. I agree with them thoroughly. May I say in this connection, however, that when we compare the management of the British equalization fund with the management of a similar fund in this country we should not necessarily reach the conclusion that we are in the same position as a people or a government in relation to its management as are the British people and the British Government. True, the British do it through a committee of three persons. Presumably this committee is selected by the British responsible ministry. If the committee handling the British equalization fund mismanages it or is guilty of misfeasance or malfeasance in any degree, the House of Commons can unhorse that ministry in 1 day's time.

Mr. DIES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. DIES. How can the House of Commons determine whether or not there is misfeasance when transactions are kept absolutely secret in England? Neither the gentleman nor anyone else can get an idea of what happens to that fund.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Secrecy, of course, can be imposed by law, but secrecy never can be maintained indefinitely, not even by bayonets. The truth is bound to leak out. If not, we would better give up our attempts at self-government.

Mr. DISNEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. DISNEY. Is it not a fact that the British deny having a stabilization fund; that the fund is actually handled by Governor Montagu Norman in his private account?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It has been stated upon the floor by gentlemen who I thought were informed upon the subject that the British did have an equalization fund. It is stated in the report of the committee.

Mr. DISNEY. I am speaking of the power to handle it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is an equalization fund, I assume.

Mr. DIES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. DIES. The equalization fund is handled by the note-issue department of the Bank of England. The Bank of England, it might be said, is divided into two parts, one of which does an ordinary commercial banking business and the other issues notes. This department of the bank is given the right to issue notes and is separate and distinct from that part of the bank which is engaged in banking transactions. So, in effect, this committee of three is directly responsible to the ministry.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; that is what I was pointing out. The board is finally responsible to the ministry, and the ministry is responsible to the majority of the Commons. That is not so in our Government; the Executive is not responsible to the majority of either the House or the Senate, but enjoys a fixed tenure of office and the change cannot be made even though it may seem necessary. I am speaking quite impersonally; I have no thought of Mr. Morgenthau in my mind as I utter these suggestions; but we are too prone to compare our Government and its customs with foreign governments.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. McFADDEN. The gentleman is aware that the Secretary of the Treasury under the terms of this bill is required to report on his handling of the stabilization fund only once a year to the Government.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Only to the President, is it not?

Mr. McFADDEN. He reports to the President only.

Mr. WADSWORTH. And not to Congress.

Mr. McFADDEN. And not to Congress.

Mr. DISNEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I am sorry, but I must decline to yield. It is a vast question and of great importance. I merely endeavored to make the comparison and to show the utter difference between the two governments in form and function.

Again, groping, there can be no question I believe that a government can select the base for its currency and fix its value. The Government can select gold; if it desires, it can select silver; if it desires, it can select any other commodity—diamonds, a bale of cotton, or a bushel of wheat—as the base of its currency, and by entirely constitutional procedure establish this article or commodity as the base, metallic or vegetable, of the currency the Government proposes to issue or to authorize. There can be no doubt about this. This being the case, I also believe that the Government, having selected the base for its currency, is not acting in an unsound way when it takes possession of all the articles or commodities or metals which it has selected as the base. I do not quarrel with the provisions of the bill on the ground that the Government should not take the gold.

If we had established a bushel of wheat as the unit of the base of our currency, I would not quarrel theoretically with the attempt of the Government to take over all the bushels of wheat in the country and put them in reserve back of the currency. My quarrel with the bill is that while the Government has the right to take possession of the base, no matter what that base may be, and own it completely, it must pay for it if it takes that base from private owners.

It cannot take private property, be it a bushel of wheat, a diamond, or an ounce of gold, without just compensation.

Referring to the assertion of the gentleman from Tennessee that the gentleman from Massachusetts had urged that whatever profit might come as a result of the Government's taking possession and later revaluing should go to the banks, the Federal Reserve in this case. Frankly, I did not hear the gentleman from Massachusetts contend any such thing. I do not recollect that he said the banks were entitled to the profits. I do not think they are. If we are to have a paper profit by the cutting in two of the unit of the base we have selected, whether we cut in two a bushel of wheat or a bale of cotton or an ounce of gold, the profit has been made as a result of a governmental act and has not been earned by the owner of the article which is used as the base. I think the owner, in this case of Federal Reserve banks, is not entitled to the profit. I still contend that the Government cannot take that thing from them physically without just compensation.

Who owns the gold in the Federal Reserve banks? The Federal Reserve banks do not own that gold. It is the member banks of the System that own the gold. They have earned it over a period of years. It has accumulated as their property, not the property of the people of all the United States but is the property of the member banks.

Mr. McKEOWN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I cannot yield to the gentleman. If under a normal proceeding liquidation came about and if there were no other interpositions of law, the gold would be distributed along with other assets. I do not object to the Government's taking this gold into the Treasury, but I am wondering if we have the right to take it without paying for it. This bill provides that it shall be paid for by the Secretary of the Treasury with something that is called in the bill "a gold certificate." Once again I am groping. I have not heard that gold certificate described here in the debate.

Mr. KNUTSON. What makes it gold?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have not found in the committee's report as yet, and we have had only a minute or two to look into this thing, that the committee has anything to say as to what that certificate is. I gather the impression that the certificate is not redeemable in gold or anything else. It is apparently to be a slip of paper handed to the Federal Reserve banks.

Mr. SOMERS of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I will, if the gentleman can straighten this out for me.

Mr. SOMERS of New York. Will the gentleman accept the definition of this gold certificate as being a sort of warehouse receipt?

Mr. WADSWORTH. A warehouse receipt? No.

Mr. SOMERS of New York. The possibility of redemption rests with the right of the Secretary of the Treasury to make regulations. He can do it if he sees fit. That is in the bill. If it is to the benefit of the country it can be done.

Mr. WADSWORTH. He can pay or not pay, as he sees fit?

Mr. SOMERS of New York. In gold.

Mr. WADSWORTH. We have delegated power in about every conceivable way, but that is a new one to me.

Mr. PERKINS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. PERKINS. Is it not quite apparent that these gold receipts will not be redeemable in gold because then the Government will be paying out the very gold that it decides to keep?

Mr. WADSWORTH. What is it doing then?

Mr. PERKINS. That is the part of the bill you have to take on faith.

Mr. MILLARD. Will the gentleman yield for a short question?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MILLARD. I heard the majority leader say that the Democratic administration was going to save the money for the people of the country, and I heard the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] intimating that the Federal Reserve System was of Republican origin. Was it not created in the era of Woodrow Wilson, and has not every Democratic nominee since pointed to it as being one of the greatest pieces of constructive legislation that has occurred in America? Now they try to say it is a Republican measure.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Of course, the gentleman is right.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman an additional 5 minutes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The gentleman from New York is correct about that. The establishment of the Federal Reserve System was the finest achievement of the Wilson administration, in my judgment, and was the result of years and years of study and effort to set up a model system of currency regulation in this country. This bill completely revolutionizes the whole thing.

Returning again to the certificate, I cannot find out whether they are to have any value at all.

Mr. BUSBY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I cannot yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BUSBY. I can help you on that point.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Perhaps the gentleman will help out the whole House in his own time.

Mr. BUSBY. I do not get any time.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am not getting any either at the present rate.

Mr. BUSBY. The gentleman on the Republican side may yield to you.

Mr. WADSWORTH. In all sincerity I am trying to find out what the gold certificates are.

Mr. BUSBY. I will tell you if you will yield. I do not mean maybe, either.

Mr. WADSWORTH. All right. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BUSBY. In the discussion at the White House these certificates were properly described. They are printed in yellow and not green. They have no more monetary value than the ordinary greenback Treasury certificates. They are not redeemable in gold. They will serve as a basis for Federal Reserve credit, just as the metal does today. That is all there is to it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Very well. Referring again to that conference, I think it was suggested that the effect would be largely psychological.

Mr. BUSBY. Yes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. So they have no value, and yet the pretense is made that by this bill they are paying for $3,400,000,000 worth of gold in these certificates.

Mr. BOILEAU. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes.

Mr. BOILEAU. At the present time the certificates are outstanding. In other words, there is no change. The same situation exists. This law does not change the situation with regard to the redeemability of the currency.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Except to this extent: When you as a private individual take your gold to the bank, if you are frightened into doing so, you are paid for it in legal tender. It is not taken away from you without so-called "just compensation." If you take a gold certificate to a bank today, if you are ordered to do it, this being a free country, you can be paid for it and will be paid for it in legal tender. They are not taking away your property without just compensation. The thing that I fear about this bill is that it constitutes an open attempt to confiscate property without just compensation.

I believe the Government has the right to condemn and take over; but if it is private property, and I believe this is, I contend it must, under the fifth amendment of the Constitution, pay for it, and it is not the part of the legislative branch of the Government to say how much the Government shall pay or how it shall pay. That is a judicial function.

Mr. DIES. Will the gentleman yield for a reference to the gold certificate?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes.

Mr. DIES. The gentleman says he does not see the difference between this gold certificate and ordinary fiat money. This is the effect of the gentleman's statement.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think I know what fiat money is.

Mr. DIES. The gentleman sees no distinction between the gold certificate and any other sort of United States paper money, such as the greenback money?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I know the basis upon which greenback money is issued. I do not know the basis upon which these certificates are issued.

Mr. DIES. Does not the gentleman see the distinction between a gold certificate that says, in effect, that there is so much gold in the Treasury, although limited as to the right of the Secretary of the Treasury to exercise his discretion as to when he will redeem that gold, and paper that has no gold backing whatever? Does not the gentleman see the distinction even though there is discretionary power given to the Secretary of the Treasury in regard to the time of redemption?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I assume this paper has gold backing, but it is not redeemable, and when it reaches the hands of the Federal Reserve member banks it is of no value to the member banks whose gold has been taken. [Applause.]

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH].

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield about 30 seconds to me to make an announcement?

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, the amendment which I expect to offer in lieu of section 10, setting up a board to administer this fund instead of the Secretary of the Treasury, may be found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of yesterday at page 948, at the bottom of the second column. It was placed in the RECORD so the Membership of the House would be able to read it in advance of its being offered.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, it is my belief and conviction that the people back home are in favor of this legislation. I believe that the average man, if he has interested himself at all in this bill, believes that the President of the United States seeks to take away money from the rich to give to the poor, and because of the disastrous consequences of the inflation in 1929 and because of the part played by the international bankers and the resulting hatred of international bankers, public opinion has been aroused and, generally speaking, the public would favor this bill, as they think it will punish the rich. They believe that they are in some way or other redistributing wealth. This has become a popular slogan, due to certain radio speeches emanating from Detroit, but this bill penalizes thrift, saving, and frugality, the very qualities that are most needed in the United States.

Now, what are the facts? The facts are that this bill constitutes repudiation, confiscation, and a capital levy, all combined in one bill to take away from those that have anything left by devaluing the dollar between 40 and 50 percent. It amounts to legalized confiscation of wealth of the masses. The facts are that when you take a dollar away from one rich man by this bill, devaluing the dollar to 60 cents or below, you are also taking a dollar from 99 other men of moderate means, men of small incomes—the butcher, the baker, and the candlestick maker, the wage earners, the consumers, the civil-service employees, the disabled veterans, and widows and orphans living on small incomes, pensions, or inheritances. All American citizens who have any income at all—millions of life-insurance policyholders, depositors in savings banks, small owners of Government and other bonds and securities will by the passage of this bill become the forgotten men. But the desire to soak the ultra-rich is so strong that nobody cares, and they forget that when you hit one of them by this legislation you are hitting ninety-nine others with moderate incomes who cannot afford to have the dollar devalued 40 percent, and this amount of their wealth confiscated by the Government. If you want to soak the rich and redistribute wealth, the way to do that is through graduated income and inheritance taxes and through doing away with tax-exempt securities.

How does it make it any easier by devaluing the dollar to 60 cents for the wage earner to earn a dollar? This has not been explained. It is going to be just as hard for the wage earner to earn the 60-cent dollar as it was to earn the dollar on the old basis. This is not a square deal for labor, but a new deal which will bear bitter fruit through increased cost of living. I am opposed to a great many of the features of this bill, yet the main reason I propose to vote against it, not reluctantly at all but openly and with the firm conviction that this devaluation bill swats the wage earner and the consumer right in the eye, and that it will retard our getting back to normal and prosperous times by making confusion worse confounded through failure to stabilize the dollar. What the country and business need is public confidence, and without stabilization there can be no restoration of business confidence or permanent revival of our industries.

The basis of sound trade is sound money. This legislation will create further uncertainties and doubts as to the soundness of our money and continue to frighten trade from our market places.

The purpose of all the legislation that has been enacted by the administration in the last 10 months, some good and some bad, I take it, is to increase the cost of commodities. Almost since the advent of your party this has been the purpose of your side of the House. Such a program has a great deal of merit, but if you succeed, as you hope to, and the cost of living goes up 50 percent on foodstuffs, clothing, and other commodities, and then you make the maximum dollar a 60-cent dollar, do you not realize the howl that is going to rise 6 months or a year from now from the wage earners who are given a 60-cent dollar to pay the high cost of living which has been brought about by congressional action through the efforts of members of your party and those who vote for this bill. In the past the Democratic Party has been known as the friend of the American consumer, owing to its opposition to the protective tariff. But when you vote for this bill, devaluing the dollar 40 to 50 percent, and spend or rather squander huge sums out of the Federal Treasury to plow under cotton, destroy crops like wheat and corn, and slaughter 4,000,000 pigs for no other purpose except to put up the price to the consumer, you cease to have the right to represent the consuming population, particularly in the East. Among other results emanating from the passage of this bill devaluing the dollar from 40 to 50 percent, the war debts owed us by foreign nations will be automatically reduced an equal amount.

Remembering the adage that "fools rush in where angels fear to tread", I realize how dangerous it is for any politician to predict anything or promise a job.

I stood on the floor of the House last June and opposed cutting the compensation to veterans with war-service-connected disabilities. I predicted at that time that when we came back this session, in addition to the cut of 25 percent the disabled veterans would be receiving, the rubber dollar would be worth approximately 50 cents. However, I want to be fair, and the fact is that the cost of living has not gone up more than 10 percent, so at the present time the 60-cent dollar does not affect to a great extent the salaries and wages of American labor. If the cost of living remains where it is, then no great harm will be done to those who work for wages. But past history teaches us that you cannot debase the value of the dollar or any other money without cheating and robbing the laborer of that which he earns by the sweat of his brow. A 60-cent dollar will, in the course of events and time, reduce the purchasing power of labor and bring increased privations and a lower standard of living.

The pretense that men can be enriched by either swelling the volume of the currency, issuing fiat money, or by huge bond issues is a delusion which has affected mankind at recurring intervals since the dawn of civilization, and is always popular in a period of depression. I am convinced that the cost of living will be increased tremendously by the issuance of $15,000,000,000 in bonds during the next few months and that the cost of living will be increased for millions of consumers and millions of wage earners, and this bill, devaluing the dollar to 60 cents or below, will work additional hardships on labor and consumers in all parts of the Nation. The real creditors are the laborers, the American wage earners; and if the creditor is to be cheated by a reduction in the value of the dollar, it is and must be at the expense of labor. The American Federation of Labor and the American Legion and other great Nation-wide organizations of that character have opposed inflation in the United States of America, as they realize the havoc that inflation has brought to the wage earners in every country that it has been tried, as they never catch up with the increase in the cost of living.

I hope that at least those of us on this side of the House—the party to which I belong and which has always stood for sound money, an honest dollar, and the gold standard and has always opposed soft money and the unsound Democratic financial policies of the past—will remember that although this bill may be popular today and although they may be currying temporary favor with their constituents back home by voting for it, the day of reckoning is coming and you will have to explain your vote to these wage earners, consumers, and men and women of moderate and small incomes, particularly in the East, when they receive a 60-cent dollar and have to pay with it the vastly increased and higher cost of living. [Applause.]

Mr. SOMERS of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield half a minute to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PETTENGILL].

Mr. PETTENGILL. Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the gentleman from New York, who has just taken his seat, this question: If everybody, as he says, loses by this bill, where does what everybody loses go?

Mr. FISH. It goes to the Government.

Mr. SOMERS of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. WHITE] 10 minutes.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, this House has before it for consideration the most vital piece of legislation affecting the welfare of the people of the United States that has ever come before Congress. It is proposed by the passage of this bill to abandon the basic principle upon which our money system was established. We are asked to disregard all the safeguards, all the principles that have made our money system stable, upon which the foundation of our business credit structure rests. We are to take the final step in the program that has been followed persistently and ruthlessly by the master minds of banking and finance since the day of Alexander Biddle and his group in control of the Bank of the United States in their scheme to seize control of the finance and credit of the people of the United States by usurping the prerogative of the Government to create and issue money, given Congress under the Constitution, wherein it is said: "Congress shall have the right to coin money and regulate the value thereof." A scheme to deprive the people of this country of a Government-controlled money system and to substitute bank-controlled credit for the safe and sound system secured by the coinage of our precious metals—the only means of attaining a stable measure of value and a standard medium of exchange. These master minds have conspired continually and successfully to secure control of our business, our welfare, and our very life.

BASIC PRINCIPAL UPON WHICH A SOUND-MONEY SYSTEM MUST REST

Mr. Chairman, to have a workable, stable, and adequate money system in this country that will serve the money needs of the people generally, we must have a system devised to prevent the control of the money value by the expansion and contraction of the money volume. The quantity of money in circulation must be kept from control of any group or any organization of men. This can only be attained by basing the money system upon the coinage of the precious metals which automatically limits the creation of money to the production of the metals upon which our money system is based. Since our Government is to supply the money needs of our people—and the creation of money is a governmental prerogative which must be jealously guarded—the creation of primary money must be based upon metals whose production is sufficient but limited to an amount that will supply a continuous stream of new money into the channels of trade and business that will keep even pace with the needs of growing population and expanding business. The use of gold alone in this country as a monetary basic has proven insufficient and the adherence to a policy of limiting our coinage to the one metal—gold—has caused periods of disastrous financial depression.

WE MUST REESTABLISH THE MONEY SYSTEM OF THE CONSTITUTION

If our Government and this Congress will return to the tried and proven monetary system established by the founders of this Government by using metals of limited production, gold and silver, we can again establish a system of creating primary money, money of ultimate redemption in a sufficient quantity; and, most important of all, secure a constant flow of new money automatically controlled to supply an increasing need of growing population and expanding business and at the same time avoid all the uncertainties and fears of a man-regulated system of credit money that will be imposed upon this country under a managed-currency system proposed in this bill.

STEPS TAKEN IN A PLAN TO SECURE BANKING CONTROL OF CREDIT AND FINANCES OF THE COUNTRY

Mr. Chairman, let me refer to the steps that have been taken in enacting past legislation in deference to the plan so persistently pressed by these master minds in control of our financial system in their efforts to secure control of the credit and finance of this country. After the repayment, Government obligations issued as a result of the Civil War and sold for depreciated currency as low as 50 cents on the dollar had been limited to "coin" and finally that "coin" was made gold that these bonds might return fabulous profits to our bondholders, we find silver was demonetized in 1873 and a disastrous fall of prices ensued. In response to the insistence of our people, an attempt was made to restore silver in a full measure to our coinage, but the master minds in banking were opposed, and after this House passed the Bland bill restoring the full status of silver at a ratio of 16 to 1 in our coinage with gold, when the bill went to the Senate the Allison amendment was offered limiting the coinage of silver and directing that the metal be purchased on a gold basis. Thus we have the first substitute for the remonetization of silver, which deprives the American people of silver as a primary money by purchasing the metal in limited quantities.

As another step to secure the abandonment of silver as money and tightening the banking control on the finances of this country, in 1890 the Sherman Act was passed to purchase silver at $1 an ounce, to be paid for in Treasury notes, mind you, not by issuing silver certificates, which would permit the Government to redeem the certificates paid out for the silver thus bought with silver dollars but Treasury notes. We find that Secretary of the Treasury Carlisle was induced to redeem these Treasury notes issued to pay for the silver purchased—in gold, to the embarrassment of our Government and to the discredit of silver.

With the repeal of the Sherman Act a further step was successfully taken in securing control of our finances and credit. The great increase in the volume of new gold that flowed into the channels of world trade during the next generation more than doubled the world's gold stock by raising the quantity of gold in existence from five billions to eleven and one-half billions of dollars, and met the growing need of money and induced an era of world prosperity.

SUBSTITUTES FOR BIMETALLISM THAT HAVE BEEN TRIED AND FAILED

When money shortage again brought another depression a means was sought to supply the deficiency, the scheme of issuing currency—credit money—based upon the assets of business, was set up under the Federal Reserve banking system. We find that again our Government has tried another substitute for the coinage of silver. When this substitute failed to supply our money needs and business depression and disaster again overtook our people, a new device was created. Once more a substitute was tried for the sound and proven system of bimetallism; Congress was induced to set up the Reconstruction Finance Corporation that put our Government in the wholesale money-lending business. At the same time we created a huge reservoir for the storage of wealth of our money kings, secure in income and out of reach of taxation by the provision to issue tax-exempt securities. What a spectacle we have here, Mr. Chairman. Our Government entering the money-lending business with all its expenses and uncertainties, relieving our financiers of all worry and risk and loss in placing loans, while the grip of the master financiers was thus strengthened upon the property and tax-paying power of every community and individual in this country. Again our substitute has failed; the misery, woe, and despair of our people is beyond the imagination.

Now, when so many of our ablest business men and disinterested bankers and thousands of our trained economists point the way to security, to safety, to financial stability, urging that we broaden the base of the money foundation that must bear our credit structure, urging the remonetization of silver, we are asked to support a policy as presented in this bill that will wreck the small base left supporting our financial structure.

Mr. Chairman, how can men ascertain and discuss intelligently the temperature of the weather if you rub out the zero mark on the thermometer? How can men conduct business and undertake financial obligations if we have no fixed measure of value. It is proposed here, Mr. Chairman, to create a huge fund of $2,000,000,000 and place it in the hands of one man with power to control price levels in this country by the use of this fund. What an engine for financial destruction we are undertaking to create. What power over the affairs of our people we propose to place in the hands of this man. Our welfare, our hopes, our happiness, our very life will be placed in jeopardy by creating this engine which is a design in opposition to the plan upon which our money system and our Government was established.

Mr. Chairman, I see only uncertainty and distress for our people in adopting the program that will be followed in passing this bill.

Mr. Chairman, I see only discredit and disaster and obliteration for the Democratic Party in accepting responsibility in enacting this legislation.

RECONSTRUCTION FINANCE CORPORATION ANOTHER UNSUCCESSFUL SUBSTITUTE FOR BIMETALLISM

Mr. Chairman, let us disregard the pressure, the intrigue, and sinister advice of the self-seeking financiers of this country. Let us have done with money substitutes. Let us return to the safe and sound and tried and proven money system given us when the Nation was established and in use when this very Capitol we stand in was built.

Mr. Chairman, the efforts of this administration, backed by our business leaders, are chiefly directed to raising commodity prices to profitable levels, particularly our basic commodities, cotton and wheat. With the price of these basic commodities in this country below the cost of production, we can have no permanent prosperity.

MUST ABANDON MONEY SUBSTITUTES

Mr. Chairman, the average gold price of wheat is fixed and controlled by the exchange value of silver. Let us go back to the records to verify this statement. Every chart, every record I have seen, reveals the close relationship between the price of silver and the price of wheat. Go back as far as you will, in the records of our Government departments in comparing the silver prices recorded in the report of the Director of the Mint, the price tables on wheat furnished by the Department of Labor will show that in 1874 the price of silver was $1.27 and the price of wheat was $1.15.

The average commodity price was index no. 81.01. In 1876 silver declined to $1.15 and wheat to $1 and commodities 72 cents. In 1882 silver was down to $1.13, wheat to 96 cents, and commodities 66 cents. In 1887 silver was down to 97.9 cents, wheat to 73 cents, and commodities 56.4 cents. In 1890 silver rose to $1.03 cents, wheat up to 97 cents, and commodities holding at 56.2 cents. In 1893 silver declined to 78.2 cents, wheat to 67.7 cents, and commodities to 53.4 cents.

Whatever the cause for this synchronization in prices, the record stands for anyone to read.

REVALUING GOLD ANOTHER SUBSTITUTE FOR REMONETIZATION OF SILVER

In passing this bill we are entering upon just another experiment. In our efforts to bring back good times by restoring commodity prices we propose to disregard silver and devalue gold in an effort to break the relationship that exists between the price of basic commodities and silver.

RETURN OF PROSPERITY DEPENDS ON RESTORATION OF PRICE OF SILVER

Mr. Chairman, this Congress and this Government has not the power to break that relationship permanently. Our efforts are doomed to fail. When the importance of silver is recognized, when we restore silver to its proper place in our monetary system, then and not until then can we restore prosperity.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HOLLISTER].

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Chairman, I must confess myself at the outset one of those "relics of a slowly dying regime", referred to this morning in picturesque language by one of the gentlemen on my right.

The intimation of the gentleman was that because of the "new deal" fiscal policies which had been sound in the past—sound-money ideas—had necessarily been thrown into the discard and that new policies had come into the ascendancy, resulting in rendering the supporters of the old policies as obsolete as the dodo bird.

There has been considerable injection of partisanship in the discussion of this measure, which I consider most unfortunate. This is not a partisan measure in any sense of the word and should not be considered as such, because we are all honestly trying here to secure the best financial environment possible under which recovery can be expedited. To say that any particular party caused the depression or that any particular party is going to pull us out of the depression is, on the face of things, silly. Parties have little control over such matters. One of our great Americans once said that no statesman, no matter how clever, ever long averted a depression, and that no politician, no matter how stupid, ever long delayed a recovery. You and I know that we are going to recover ultimately from the depths in which we now find ourselves. Nothing can long hold back the forward progress of this country. Our people have too much energy, intelligence, and ability and our land has too many natural resources to make the outcome at all doubtful. The only question is, Shall we do so many foolish things in our effort to expedite our recovery that instead of expediting it we delay it?

Mr. SOMERS of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLLISTER. I cannot now. I wish to quote here an extract from a speech made by Mr. James Warburg, which is in line with what I have been saying:

> A monetary policy can provide an environment in which recovery can take place. A monetary policy can likewise provide an environment in which recovery is either retarded or else becomes altogether impossible, but a monetary policy cannot by itself produce recovery. When we speak of recovery we mean reemployment of those not normally out of work and a general improvement of living conditions for all. That result can only be attained in an environment provided by a monetary and fiscal policy in which the normal man is again willing to enter upon the normal risks of business.

In other words, we must adopt a monetary policy which begets confidence, reestablishes confidence generally in the minds of those engaged in the industry and business of the country, before the wheels can again turn and employment can again become general.

There is held out in this bill the alluring bait of revaluation, which is, in my opinion, to a great extent responsible for the lack of opposition to this measure which would be aroused if its implications were fully understood. Devaluation appeals to the inflationist, who has been crying for something of this kind, and it appeals to a great extent to the sound-money man who perhaps does not want devaluation but wants stability above all and who has been waiting for a definite statement from the administration looking toward ultimate stability.

But the devaluation part of the bill is the least important part of it. If that were all the bill contained, I do not think there would be any great objection to it. True, it is indecisive, it does not yet say where or when ultimate stabilization is going to take place, the value fixed is probably too low, but the fact remains that it is at least a move toward a stabilization policy.

The important parts of this bill, however, are entirely separate and distinct from the devaluation provision. Mr. Chairman, if we pass this bill today, we are witnesses of the first step in the summary execution of the Federal Reserve System. Both sides of this House have claimed credit for fathering the Federal Reserve System. It has been claimed by the Democratic Party on many occasions as one of their great achievements, for it was enacted by a Democratic Congress. Republicans, on the other hand, have said that it was conceived in the minds of their party leaders long beforehand. It has been well administered and has earned the confidence of the people. It is, of course, our central bank. Its authors, in their wisdom, concluded that it was unwise to have a politically controlled central bank, or one owned by the Government, and for this reason decided to set it up under the ownership of the private banking system of the country, with a sufficient amount of Federal influence and supervision to insure cooperation with the Treasury. Notwithstanding this background, we are today threatening to take away from the central banking system of our country, which has stood the test of time so well for so many years, many of its powers and turn them over to the Secretary of the Treasury. Without really appreciating what we are doing we are transferring many of the functions of the Federal Reserve System which has been set up with such great care and turning them over to the Secretary of the Treasury, a politically appointed individual under the control of no one but the President. I do not mean to criticize in any way the present Secretary of the Treasury of the United States.

The fact remains that any Secretary of the Treasury is a political appointee and in the nature of things is subject to pressures and influence which the head of the central bank should not have to suffer.

It may be that the Federal Reserve System needs to be substantially remodeled. I am inclined to think that it does in many aspects. If that is the case, should not that be done in the proper way? Should there not be hearings in the proper committee, and should we not secure the studied opinion of the best experts available? A complete study of the whole Federal Reserve System would, I am sure, be welcomed by all in an honest effort to determine where it may be strengthened or changed, involving, perhaps, the elimination or transfer of many of its functions. But if we are to do this, let us do it in the proper way. Let us study the whole question. Let us not by backstairs methods take away its chief functions and relegate it to a kind of mechanical overseer of the banking system of the country without any real powers.

A great deal has been said on the subject of the taking away of the gold belonging to the Federal Reserve System and turning it over to the Government. The constitutional aspect of taking that gold is of great importance, but it has been covered by others, and I shall not go into it further.

The proponents of the bill justify this action by stating that it is not fair to leave the profit on this gold arising from devaluation, in the hands of the System. But, Mr. Chairman, it is not at all necessary, in order to put the profit in the hands of the Government, to take that gold away from the Federal Reserve System. It is perfectly simple to set up on the books of the Federal Reserve bank a credit in favor of the Government to the extent of the dollar devaluation and leave the gold where it is, so that it may serve the purposes it has always served. Are we to take away from the System the function of settling international balances? Are we to assume the holder of a Federal Reserve note, that when he holds a note in his hand, instead of knowing that there is something behind that note, gold in the hands of the Federal Reserve, there is instead nothing but a so-called "gold certificate", which in turn is redeemable in gold only if the Secretary of the Treasury sees fit to approve? Why take that gold away from the place it belongs and where it serves a particular function and then turn it over to the Secretary of the Treasury to hold for the Government of the United States, when that is not at all necessary?

We also in this bill give rights to the Secretary of the Treasury to perform various banking functions, "to drafts, checks, bills of exchange, acceptances, foreign exchange, bonds, notes, and so forth." The Treasury becomes, in fact, a central bank, leaving two such organizations attempting to function side by side, with the certainty of conflict which such a situation invites.

We are also putting in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury a huge fund, which he may administer as he sees fit, theoretically for the avowed purposes of the bill, but without any real control except that the President may call for a report from time to time. Here again we have a direct conflict. Conceivably the Federal Reserve System might be attempting open-market operations in one direction, while at the same time the Secretary of the Treasury, operating secretly, might be proceeding at exactly cross-purposes to the operations of the Federal Reserve Board. If we really want to get rid of the Federal Reserve System, let us do it openly and in the proper way. Let us not shake the confidence that the people have in the Federal Reserve System and in the currency issued thereunder. There has been no breath of scandal, there has been no accusation of political influence in connection with the Federal Reserve, and we must not let the people of the country feel that we are trying to emasculate it under the guise of general support of the new deal. No financial policy will succeed unless it commands the confidence of the people, and this must be retained at all costs. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HOLLISTER] has expired.

Mr. SOMERS of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield one-half minute to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SCHULTE].

Mr. SCHULTE. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the Committee, we the Members of Congress are this afternoon called upon to vote on H.R. 6976, a bill to protect the currency system of the United States, to provide for the better use of the monetary gold stock of the United States, and for other purposes.

There is not any question in my mind but what this is the most vital bill that has come before the Members of the Seventy-third Congress. This bill, in its effect, will revolutionize the entire monetary system of this great Nation. It will bring back wages to the workers which will in turn create a purchasing power and, I believe, restore this country back to normal. Therefore, it is with a great deal of pleasure and, I might add, a great deal of pride that I am going to support this bill. It has been told to us here this afternoon that this bill originated in the White House, and it is the wishes of our great leader that it be passed here this afternoon. I want to assure you that I am not going to stand in the way of our great President. He has asked for this power and I believe that it is the duty of the Members of this august body to go along with him. He has shown himself capable and able to carry on this great work that he has started.

We have enacted other laws that were severe, but I believe that this bill is the most revolutionary in scope that we have been called upon to vote for.

In my district I am certain that the devaluation of the dollar will help not only the rank and file of my people, but also the wealthy, and the men and women who are trying to make a living as merchants.

As I believe the majority of the people of the country are in about the same plight as the people of my district I feel that the effect of this legislation will be of benefit universally in this country.

With the cheaper money, there will be more in circulation; with more in circulation the average man, the wage earner, will have an opportunity to have more dollars and in turn the stream of credit will be wider for him, and he certainly he will have more ability to pay. It is the same old problem that that which is hard to get is scarce. Money has been too scarce the last few years, and obviously, hard to get.

I cannot see where this legislative program as it concerns money will cause any hardship on the workingman.

What I should like to see is the 1926 dollar brought back, so that the American people could pay off the debts they contracted during the last few years with a dollar that had the same value that they agreed to pay off on. During the recess of Congress I made scores of speeches in my district in which I urged the return of the old dollar as the only cure of the depression, and leaders in my district agreed with me that it is utterly impossible to pay off old debts with the 1933 dollar.

The American people demand an adequate amount of currency in circulation to restore prices to their 1926 levels; to restore the American farm to its $15,000 value; to restore wheat to $2 a bushel; to restore cotton to its 30 cents a pound, and prices which will restore, first, raw materials to the old prosperity-day levels.

And I assure you that when that is done the industrialists of my district and your district, the manufacturers of my district and your district, the merchants and wholesalers and retailers will all march along in step, and wages will follow, as is the march of things in economic order, and the sun of prosperity and good times will again shine upon the American people and bread lines will be a thing of the past and relief agencies will be forgotten.

And it will give the workingman of my district, who toiled from morning until night in the mills and factories to make payments on his little home, but who during the depression years has been unable to keep up the payments on his home and has been in danger of losing it, a chance to pay off with the devalued dollar and allow him to take his place in this land of freedom and to breathe a new breath of relief, knowing that he has an opportunity under this Government to free himself from the worry and misery of debts, and to allow him to again put something aside for a rainy day and to rear his children as American children should be raised, and to live again as American people should live, unafraid of the future prosperity of this country and unafraid to look to the coming of winter's sleet and snow, because he knows that bread lines have been forgotten and that with a chance to work again he need not spend sleepless nights wondering if the relief agency down the street would have sufficient funds to pay for his pittance.

It will mean a new day has dawned for the heads of American homes, who, after all, are the backbone of our country, and who should receive the greatest of concern from the Government at Washington.

There is not any question but that we are going to get a great deal of opposition from the international banker and his ilk; but my people have taken their losses, through loss of their homes, and have been in want and hunger; they have suffered. I believe that now is the time for the international banker to do his part. He must be given to understand that this is a new deal—and the "new deal" means the redistribution of wealth. This is the new dawn of a new era. Mr. President, I hope that this bill passes.

Mr. SOMERS of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BURKE].

Mr. BURKE of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, the importance of this bill now before the Committee seems to me to exceed the sum total that may be derived from consideration of the specific provisions contained in the bill.

During the hearings held by the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures a number of distinguished witnesses who appeared before that committee, in referring to trade balances, used the term "invisibles." It seems to me that we may properly use some such term here. The gentleman from New York sees in this measure, as a part of the invisibles, an attempt to redistribute wealth. The gentleman sees in this bill an attempt to punish the rich. I think it is very hard to find anything of that nature implied in this measure, and it seems to me the gentleman from Ohio who just spoke, Mr. HOLLISTER, has more nearly ascertained the real spirit of this bill; that is, that there is here an attempt being made, the first beginning, but a long stride toward taking away from the central banking institutions, as the gentleman said—but I will say private banking institutions and individuals of the country—their control over our monetary system. I think that is what is in this bill, although not specifically stated. If you are one of those who favor restoring to the Central Government its control over our monetary system, then you should vote in favor of this measure.

It seems to me important that we should consider the specific provisions of this bill in the light of what I say is the underlying purpose. When we apply that test, and I will not have time to do it, to the various provisions, when we apply it to this proposal, for instance, to take all the gold from the Federal Reserve banks and from elsewhere and place it in the Federal Treasury, we see at once that that is essential, if we are really going to place in the hands of the Central Government full control over the monetary system.

It would not be enough to do simply, as the heads of the Federal Reserve banks now suggest, require that they surrender the profit arising from the deflation. If the Central Government is to have control of its own monetary system, it must have the basic metal under its own control. So, if we consider either of the other major features of this bill in the light of this interpretation that I should like to place upon it, we will find that the bill should be enacted just as it stands, without any amendments except those suggested by the committee. [Applause.]

I yield back the balance of my time, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back 1 minute.

Mr. SOMERS of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. CARPENTER].

Mr. CARPENTER of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, a great deal has been said about this important subject that we are now considering, and I should like to make a few personal observations.

We had before our committee the so-called "financial experts", people who are supposed to be the last word in the effects of this bill: men who represent all financial strata in this country. I failed to find one man who would agree with another. In conclusion, I made up my mind that we here, as well as those men, are really talking about something that is purely theoretical in form. None of us knows what the reactions or functions of this bill will be. There has been a great deal of talk and criticism about transferring the duties of administering this bill to the Secretary of the Treasury. I might say in that connection it is my opinion that secrecy in the administration of this fund is paramount to anything else contained in the bill.

I think this is the first step of the administration, through this stabilization fund, to force some sort of plan to stabilize the American dollar with regard to the English pound. I believe, for example, if two people were playing a game of poker, and I, for one, laid down my hand and said, "I am going to bet on this", and the other man had me beaten, of course, he would probably raise me out of my chair. I believe that the President of the United States, in the final analysis, is going to administer this fund himself, through possibly the physical efforts of the Secretary of the Treasury. It is also my personal opinion that there is not another man in this country who has more knowledge and a greater fund of absolute facts, not only pertaining to this country but all other countries, and that he, in my judgment, is the one best able and best qualified to administer this fund.

A great deal has been said about the Federal Reserve System. I think the people of this country are under a misapprehension in believing that the notes issued by the Federal Reserve System are in turn guaranteed by the United States Government. By reason of this unintentional subterfuge the people accept these notes for what they are worth.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARPENTER of Nebraska. I yield.

Mr. McFADDEN. I may say to the gentleman from Nebraska that the Federal Reserve notes are guaranteed by the United States Government.

Mr. CARPENTER of Nebraska. Contrary to the statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the Governor of the Federal Reserve Bank in Philadelphia said they were not; that as a matter of fact the Federal Reserve System itself guaranteed these notes; and, incidentally, he said he would rather have the guaranty by the Federal Reserve than by the Federal Government. That is his statement.

Mr. McFADDEN. The law provides that the Federal Government is responsible for the redemption of the Federal Reserve notes.

Mr. CARPENTER of Nebraska. All I know is that the Governor of the Federal Reserve Bank of Philadelphia said that is not true and, as a matter of fact, that it is the general impression given to the people of the country.

In the final analysis, I think it is not so much a question of what is back of this currency, whether it be gold, silver, or some other commodity, as it is the confidence of the American people in their Government. I believe there might be a situation where the currency could be redeemable 100 percent by gold, but that the gold coverage would be ineffective because the people had no confidence in their Government. It goes without saying this is a situation we want to avoid.

Mr. SOMERS of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARPENTER of Nebraska. I yield.

Mr. SOMERS of New York. Is it not amazing that so many people question the faith of the currency of the American Government while having no hesitancy whatever in accepting the currency of some of our foreign neighbors?

Mr. CARPENTER of Nebraska. It certainly is amazing.

Mr. SOMERS of New York. They never stop to question that there is no gold behind the pound sterling or behind the Japanese yen; but the moment we take any portion of gold from the unit of American currency, they throw up their hands in horror and say everything is going to smash.

Mr. CARPENTER of Nebraska. In my judgment, in the final analysis, the good to be derived from the provisions of this bill will be realized through the confidence and integrity with which this stabilization fund of $2,000,000,000 is administered.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARPENTER of Nebraska. I yield.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. The gentleman from Massachusetts speaks of these as depreciated dollars. Is it not a fact, if we offer them to the Government in payment of our taxes, the Government will receive them dollar for dollar?

Mr. CARPENTER of Nebraska. Yes.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BEEDY].

Mr. BEEDY. Mr. Chairman, although I have served here nearly 14 years, I have never become hardened to the point of being able to face without some pertubation of mind the fact that many times when serious matters are being discussed there are hurled across this aisle political epithets and a great deal of political sophistry. I was disturbed today when at the outset of this discussion the gentleman from New York rose and said, to the apparent delight of the galleries, that the Republican Party had an idea that the Federal Government was far removed, a thing apart, on the one hand, and that over here were the people who ought not to have anything to do with it, but that the Democratic Party believed that the Federal Government belonged to the American people. Of course, good Democratic partisans applauded that statement.

Now, let us be fair. There is not a man in this House who took the oath of office who does not have before him in these tragic hours of the life of this Republic the desire to do his sworn duty, regardless of political lines, in the way that will accrue to the benefit of the whole people of the Nation. I want the RECORD clear that there is on this side of the aisle a small group of men who in the hour of their defeat still accept their responsibility seriously and are anxious today to serve in a way which will be to the interest of the whole people to whom this Government belongs.

We have before us a measure which strikes at the vitals of the monetary system and which affects every dollar in every pocket and till in the Nation. The whole story was told a moment ago when the gentleman from Missouri rose in his place and said:

> This is a legislative proposal of Franklin Roosevelt. Pass it! Who is there here who dares vote against it?

Let us get away from personalities. I am not concerned with the personality of the President or the personalities of those men, who, when the last administration was in power, did, perhaps, some things they ought not to have done. Let us get down to principles.

When the emergency was upon us in the days of the special session of Congress one piece of legislation after another came up from the White House, which were written the day before. With them came the order to pass them, and we passed them. We Republicans followed along like good soldiers all through that session. No one will make the accusation that during that time this minority did other than that which was for the good of the country as those in authority and places of responsibility saw it. We are now approaching that stage in the emergency where the light is beginning to dawn. It is beginning to dawn, not by reason of anything done in this country but as the result of a world-wide upward trend. As a recent issue of Foreign Affairs shows in a series of graphs, the whole trend of trade the world over is upward.

This is the legislative branch of the Government. It is our duty to formulate legislation, to consider it, and to pass or reject it; but here is a piece of legislation sent up by the President, far-reaching in nature. I think I am within the truth when I say there are not 12 men in this House who can explain in detail, or to the satisfaction of their constituents, what this bill authorizes either the President or the Secretary of the Treasury to do, or what its consequences may be.

Is this a representative government or is it not? Has not the hour come when we must ask ourselves whether, in duty to the people of the country, we should exercise our prerogatives or cease drawing our salary, close the doors to these legislative halls, and go home?

There is much in this bill that I voted for at the last session. Much of authority herein sought has already been given to the Executive. There is a great deal in this bill that I am not ashamed to confess I do not understand.

Let me leave this thought with you: You are going to take a function from the Federal Reserve System and transfer it to a man in the Treasury Department on the ground that it is for the good of the country. The Federal Reserve System, for which your party has claimed credit, but which I call the child of the best brains of both parties, set up a series of 12 central banks, scattered throughout this land, each bank independent and autonomous.

The Federal Reserve System is not a private institution in the sense that it is organized for profit; profit is incidental. The surplus in the System was but recently taken over to the tune of $140,000,000 to make possible the guaranty deposit law. The reserves of this System serve as a buttress for the credit and the currency of the Nation. Upon its dissolution its surplus and undivided profits go to the Government. The System is quasi-public and under the direction of a nonpartisan Federal Reserve Board of Governors.

There is a great misconception of the true characteristics of the Federal Reserve System—this Federal Reserve System you are about to disembowel today. As the result of years of study, it was created on a broad base to embrace a national viewpoint. It was enjoined with the obligation to serve the best interests of agriculture, commerce, and industry. We must not blink our eyes to the fact that there are money interests in this country which do not have the national viewpoint. Such interests are doubtless centered in a certain great city of the East. But the Federal Reserve System, with its 12 central banks of issue, each bank representing a distinct section of the country, and each vested with voting power to offset the moneyed interests of that central city of the East, affords a strong guaranty of credit operations for the good of the country.

Mark you, the system was wisely designed. But humans have perverted it. But by this bill you propose to destroy the System.

You would give to one man the power now vested in the Federal Reserve System. You would authorize him to buy and sell Government securities in the open market. But he, a Secretary of the Treasury, is interested as a heavy borrower for the Government, which is in the control of his political party. May he be relied upon at all times to maintain the broadest national viewpoint.

This step which your President urges upon you will rise up to plague you.

I am not going to vote for the bill. I do not know what is in it. The House has had no benefit of hearings and is without authentic information as to the provisions of the bill. I cannot be a good legislator and proceed in the darkness of an utter lack of information.

Let me call your attention to section 13 of the bill:

> All actions, regulations, rules, orders, and proclamations heretofore taken, promulgated, made, or issued by the President of the United States or the Secretary of the Treasury, under the act of March 9, 1933, or under section 43 or section 45 of title III of the act of May 12, 1933, are hereby approved, ratified, and confirmed.

Is there a Member here who knows what this blanket covers? Is there a man here who knows what acts his vote for this bill, containing such a section, covers? Is there a man here who could go to his constituents after voting thus blindly and say, "I knew what I was doing when I voted for the President's monetary bill"?

I venture to say there are not 10 men here who could intelligently explain such a vote.

I am not going to vote for this legislation and swallow this thing. I want the chance to sit in committee and question the proper authorities. I want the benefit of regular hearings upon important legislative proposals. Through such procedure are the liberties of the American people secure. Thus and thus alone may we as legislators hope to contribute to the stability of representative government. [Applause.]

Mr. SOMERS of New York. Mr. Chairman, the time remaining does not permit the detailed analysis of the important measure before you, but the debate has been thorough and has encompassed the main features of the bill, so we may, upon the information at hand, approve or reject this bill according to the light in which we see it.

Before touching, in a broad way, upon the purpose of this measure, let me refer to a statement made by a gentleman on the other side of the House, which, in my opinion, is susceptible to an interpretation that I am sure was not intended. None of us are interested in the religion of the one to whom the funds in this bill are intrusted. It has been my experience that we cannot mark with any degree of accuracy an individual's intelligence or integrity by his religion, so I have never stopped to consider the religion of the Secretary of the Treasury. As a matter of fact, it makes no difference to me whatever. I have not been privileged to know the Secretary more than a very few days, but in this short time I have come to like him. I believe he is an absolutely patriotic American worthy of any responsibility we may ask him to assume. If he be a Jew and if the Jewish race produces this type of man, then I pray God to give us more Jews.

Mr. Chairman, as I sat here this afternoon and listened to the eloquent gentleman from Massachusetts I was so impressed by his charming delivery and gracious manner of argument that for a moment I envied him. I felt I, too, should like to be an orator; yet as the succeeding minutes gradually freed me from the spell of his speech, I awoke to the realization that I did not want to be an orator. I did not want to be anything more than I am this moment—the humble vehicle aglow in the honor of bringing before this great forum the declaration of financial independence of the United States. [Applause.]

It is only lately we have come to realize how dependent we are upon foreign currencies. The rapid systems of world-wide communication, eliminating, as they do, time and distance, tend to equalize world markets with astounding celerity. Because of this, the pound, the yen, the franc, and even the milreis, along with all other currencies, have a definite influence upon the American dollar. For instance, London controls the status of the moneys of more than a billion people. These moneys indirectly control all the others. If sterling falls in terms of gold, the purchasing power of a majority of the world's population is decreased, trade is reduced, and prices fall.

We know the British Isles are interested in low prices of commodities so they may feed and clothe their people and let them trade by reexporting. We are a Nation that must dispose of surpluses at high price or reduce our scale of living. Thus the conflict of interests. We do not want to interfere unnecessarily with our British friends, but we must protect ourselves. In the measure we are considering today, we attempt to divorce our dollar from foreign control and provide for the means of managing the dollar for the mutual benefit of our consumer and our producer, and incidentally protect our debtors from bankruptcy and our creditors from repudiation.

The instrument or bill you have before you has frequently been called a "monetary" measure. I hold it is primarily a political-economy measure. It is not designed simply to cut the gold content of the dollar or to transfer the Federal Reserve gold to the Treasury. Either could be done by a much simpler bill. But it is designed for one definite purpose, and that purpose is to coordinate and make possible the success of every emergency measure that has so far been promoted by this administration. In this respect it, too, is an emergency measure; but should the future demand a managed currency, this practice defined therein may very properly become permanent.

The bill establishes a stabilization fund set up to deal in foreign exchange and other instruments of credit and security. The fund is obtained by transferring the gold of the Federal Reserve System to the Treasury and revaluing it in terms of American dollars. It is planned to keep this revaluation in a range of 50 to 60 percent of the old value. Some there are who claim that this range is not properly placed. I think we must assume, however, that the President, in placing this range, had at his disposal more information than we have. I personally believe that the American dollar, under proper management, will have a tendency to grow stronger. If so, some future adjustment may be necessary. But that is a question of the future and should not deter us in our action today. At any rate, the establishment of a range means that we will not try to stabilize our dollar with a definite gold content for the moment, but will endeavor to stabilize other currencies in terms of ours, thus ending the dislocation between the external and internal values of our dollar.

If this fund is operated successfully, it should relieve the taxpayer of the weight of the terrific tax burden brought about by our war against this depression. To sustain this contention, let me call to your mind the success the British have enjoyed with their equalization fund. Their fund was established about the middle of April 1932. Six months later they were able to fund their war debts, amounting to more than 2,000,000,000 pounds, an amount that approximates our present indebtedness. In the light of its possibilities, this fund becomes exceedingly interesting, to say the least; but in order to succeed, it must be handled efficiently and secretly. Secretly because if its moves are known it can be counteracted by any opposing force. A knowledge of the intentions of the one controlling this fund would open the door to speculation which might very well be costly to the American public. We must bear in mind that exchange operators, like chess players, can tell you the fifth and sixth moves if you give them the moves that led up to the fourth. Hence, strictest secrecy must be observed. It is also impractical to have too large a board of operation. The more people connected with it, the more difficult it is to move quietly or with efficiency. The manager of this fund must be able to move at a moment's notice. The bird of opportunity is constantly on the wing. A cumbersome board pondering in its deliberations would be at the mercy of all who would oppose it.

I do not believe this bill alone and by itself can lift us out of the depression, for I am not one of those who maintains this is purely a monetary depression. But I do believe that money is very close to the root of our troubles and that monetary systems of the past did not work perfectly. Nearly all authorities seem to agree in this respect. Hence we should be encouraged to try to find a more perfect system, a system which will take into consideration the habits and customs of all the people of the world, for until such a system is devised we must expect currency dislocations to reflect themselves in social disorders.

As said before, the bill transfers from the Federal Reserve Board to the Treasury such gold as is now in the possession of that private institution. In return for this gold they are given a warehouse receipt upon which to base their future currency. The bankers of America claim this is not proper security. It is amusing to some of us to hear them weep over their loss of gold and talk of security. They did not have so much to say about security when, before and during 1929, they dumped millions of worthless foreign paper on the unsuspecting American public. It is just such abuses of our old system as this that prompt the American people to take the action they are now determined upon. Gold, being a prime necessity, should be in the control of the Government, and the Government alone. The proper use of gold is as necessary to the health and happiness of man as is the air he breathes, and hence we cannot tolerate private control.

In our scheme of things there are two governments, the visible and the invisible. You and I are part of the visible. We have a part control over the people of the United States. But the more powerful government is the invisible. That is a government of money and of banks. The thing we are trying to do here today is to take some control from the invisible government and put it into the hands of one who is responsible to the public.

I want to say this for my committee. We do not believe that this is a perfect instrument. Our committee will continue to watch it and study it in the hope of suggesting amendments to perfect it. [Applause.] Oh, no; you must not attempt to laugh at or ridicule that statement. I am just trying to be perfectly honest with you. You know, deep down in your hearts, that no important legislation ever considered by this House has been perfect on its first passage. There may be things in this measure that we will want to change in the future. But I honestly believe that we should pass it now in order to strengthen the hand of our beloved President, the only leader of the last 5 years who has done anything worth while to lead the American people out of the pain, despair, distress, and misery of this depression. In this measure we are saying to him, "We who have given the more can give the less. Take control of this money system if you want it, only lead us away from the control of selfish interests. Lead us to the contentment, to the happiness, and to the security we are entitled to enjoy."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired. All time has expired. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the short title of this act shall be the "Gold Reserve Act of 1934."

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, the founder of the great Rothschild banking house said, "If you will let me furnish the money of a country, I care not who makes its laws."

I have often talked with Mr. Eugene Meyer, whom you know very well. Our ideas do not agree on many things, but I guess that is my fault. But this is one thing that he always asserts in each conversation: After all, it does not make much difference what kind of laws you pass. The thing that gets results is administration.

We have had monetary laws which would, perhaps, have met almost all of the things that we propose to do in this particular bill; in fact, the President told us that he had all of the authority he is asking for here, and that the Attorney General had vouched for his having such authority, but that Congress, perhaps, being given the constitutional right to deal with this question ought to emphatically say what they think on the subject, and this bill is a result of his request.

Now, I would call your attention to the fact that it is not the currency that is issued from the Treasury or coined from the mints that is going to affect our monetary policy. We are bound to depend on the banking set-up in this country. About 0.1 of our circulating media is coined and issued currency and 0.9 of our circulating media is what we call "bank money" or "check money", which results from deposits in banks. This 0.1 of the currency is always frightened when bank credit is in distress for the simple reason that each banker agrees with the depositor that he will redeem his deposits in currency on request. There are $9 of bank currency to be redeemed by each dollar of coined or issued currency sponsored by the Government. The proposition will not work. Forty billion dollars of bank deposits cannot be redeemed by the small amount of currency the banks can obtain.

Here is our situation. Today the banks have a lot of money or rather credit on their books that they are not lending to business. They have something like $1,000,000,000 of cash in their vaults, and they have with the Federal Reserve System another billion dollars of "excess reserves" which they have placed on cold storage with the Federal Reserve System where it is to remain until the Government sells another issue of bonds. Then they will purchase Government bonds with these excess reserves. These excess reserves might go to business, but the banks say they cannot collect when they make loans and therefore they do not make loans to business.

Mr. Jones, head of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, was before our committee only a few days ago. He told how the R.F.C. was buying preferred stock and furnishing funds to the banks throughout the country so they could make loans and accommodate business. I asked, "Do they lend to business when you furnish them this money?" He indicated not to a satisfactory degree. I said, "Do you buy preferred stock from any banks and furnish them additional funds that already have excess reserves with the Federal Reserve System?" He said, "Plenty of them."

When the R.F.C. buys these preferred stocks and thereby puts additional money in the hands of the banks, the banks add that money to their already large quantity of excess reserves and it waits until the Government sells more United States bonds. Then these banks buy additional Government bonds. This is additional deflation, putting business at a greater disadvantage than before the bonds were sold.

Now, the situation is this, my friends: The holdings of the Federal Reserve System in Government bonds have increased since 1929 from over $2,000,000,000 in Government bonds to more than $12,000,000,000 at the present time. The process is one of deflation which allows the banks to take the funds received from depositors and invest them in Government bonds. This is an injury to the chance of business to get funds and a deflation by the bond sales. We never can remedy our situation by continuing to sell Government bonds.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, the most vital legislation enacted under this administration reaches its culmination in the passage of this bill. The abandonment of the gold standard, the investing the President with vast discretionary powers as to decreasing the gold content of the dollar, authorizing the coinage of silver with such ratio to gold as he might determine, and the issuing of currency to the extent of $3,000,000,000; these were preliminary steps to which the instant legislation is the logical conclusion. No Member of this House who voted for them can in good faith defend a vote against this bill. And no man can defend a vote for or against either that legislation or this upon the ground of party policy or upon the ground of his obligation to follow any particular leadership. We deal here with a question affecting, for good or ill, and for generations to come, the welfare of the American people. In voting on it, I owe no obligation except to the people whose representative I am; and there is no consideration which can relieve me of the obligation to exercise, in casting my vote, the very best judgment of which I am capable.

It must, however, be a matter of profound regret with most of the Members of this House that in the consideration of this intricate problem of national finance we are certainly in no better position than the leading economists and financiers of the day, whom we find arguing on all sides of the pending issue with quite evident sincerity, but with absolute inability to agree. After listening patiently to my learned colleagues, I am entirely convinced, with due respect to them, that they do not know and cannot with any degree of certainty predict just what the final and complete result of this legislation may be. I certainly do not pretend to any greater degree of knowledge than they possess. We must frankly admit that we are entering upon an experiment, justified, we believe, by unusual and distressful conditions. Of one thing, however, I am convinced, and that is that a depreciation of the value of hoarded, and oftentimes unearned and ill-gotten wealth, in comparison with the things which millions produce with their hands in the field and in the factory, and which are essential to the preservation and enjoyment of life, is highly desirable.

If this proposed law decreases the value of the untold billions that are garnered today in a few piles and adds at the same time to the value of the fruits of the labor of the ordinary man, I know of no stronger argument that can be used in its favor. I am not concerned with the crocodile tears of those who feel that we are robbing the Federal Reserve banks or that we are depriving great capitalistic interests of the value of property without due process of law or without proper compensation. The time has come in this country when men must decide whether they will place property rights above human rights. The highest function of government is to insure the well-being and happiness of the governed, and, so far as I am concerned, there is not a dollar in any bank vault or in any man's pocket which is entitled to protection at the expense of human welfare. If that be treason to the Constitution and its guaranties of property rights, make the most of it. The debtor people of this Nation owe $200,000,000,000 and they can never repay it under present conditions. I will not help the Shylocks get their pound of flesh, but if I can, as I am assured is true, help to ease the debt burden of the people by decreasing the value of the thing they owe in terms of what they have to pay it with by voting for this bill, it is my duty—not reluctantly, but joyfully—to do that thing. What other results may eventually follow I believe no human being knows; but I have seen the financial policies of the President lift to some extent the burden of the ordinary American citizen, and I know that as perhaps no other President in history he has at heart the welfare of the common people. I have supported him in every step of his financial policy, and I shall support him in this, without the purpose to place the entire burden on his shoulders if it should go wrong by claiming that we merely follow his leadership, but with a full sense of our responsibility as Members of this House and with the intent in my stay here, be it short or long, to place the life, liberty, and pursuit of happiness of the American citizen far above any considerations relating to dollars, be they gold, silver, currency, or what not. I believe this bill does that; I believe it assays the gold of happiness in the hearts of the people at a higher value than that in the dollar, and believing that, I take pleasure in giving it my support. [Applause.]

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman and members of the Committee, when this legislation came up I was not so much interested in how many grains there would be in the dollar—the only thing I wanted to know was whether there would be 2 half dollars, 4 quarters, and 10 dimes, because that is the money that I am familiar with. [Laughter.] That is the kind of money that most Americans are interested in.

I was somewhat amused at the speech of the splendid gentleman from New York, my good friend Mr. WADSWORTH. He is one of the shrewdest Members in this House, and he feigned that he did not understand the bill at all. I have seen this gentleman in the House before. His purpose was not that he did not understand the bill—he understands it just as well as any other man in the House—but he wanted to see if any of our fellows could explain it. [Laughter.]

He raised the question of taking property without just compensation. We have heard that before, that we were going to take someone's property without just compensation. I want to find out whose property we are taking.

When the order came to turn in your gold I happened to have some gold coins—two or three $20 gold pieces—and some gold certificates. I turned them in to the bank. I do not know who is going to get this profit, but I turned them in.

Now, as to this proposition of taking money without just compensation, the Supreme Court of the United States years ago held that the change made in gold coin does not in any way deprive the people of their property without due process of law under the fifth amendment.

Why? That amendment means direct action, but under the decision of the Court anything that may be the consequence of lawful power cannot be held to be taking property without due process of law.

The decision is so plain that even the layman, although not a lawyer, can understand it. Let me read:

> Closely allied to the objection we have just been considering is the argument pressed upon us that the Legal Tender Acts were prohibited by the spirit of the fifth amendment, which forbids taking private property for public use without just compensation or due process of law. That provision has always been understood as referring only to a direct appropriation and not to consequential injuries resulting from the exercise of lawful power. It has never been supposed to have any bearing upon or to inhibit laws that indirectly work harm and loss to individuals. A new tariff, an embargo, a draft, or a war may inevitably bring upon individuals great losses; may, indeed, render valuable property almost valueless. They may destroy the worth of contracts. But whoever supposed that, because of this, a tariff could not be changed, or a nonintercourse act, or an embargo be enacted, or a war be declared? By the act of June 28, 1834, a new regulation of the weight and value of gold coin was adopted and about 6 percent was taken from the weight of each dollar. The effect of this was that all creditors were subjected to a corresponding loss. The debts then were subjected to a corresponding loss. The debts then due became solvable with 6 percent less gold than was required to pay them before. The result was thus precisely what it is contended the Legal Tender Acts worked. But was it ever imagined this was taking private property without compensation or without due process of law?

Mr. GRAY. Mr. Chairman, the Federal Constitution vests in Congress the power to issue and control the value of money. This power has been surrendered and is now being exercised by the Federal Reserve Board under the Federal Reserve System, a private banking octopus, rivaling and defying the Government itself. This legislation is not a full or complete step, it is the first or preliminary step looking to the recovery of that power from private banking interest and to restore that power back to Congress and the representatives of the people where the Constitution placed it, and where it rightfully belongs. [Applause.]

The special session of Congress called to convene to ascertain the cause of the panic and provide a remedy found the depression had resulted from a fall of values and the price level, destroying earnings and income from industry, and the buying and consuming power of the people. And Congress further found that relief required a rise of values and the price level to restore earnings and income from industry and the power of the people to buy and consume. And, further concluding, Congress found that onen cause of the panic, the first, immediate, and far greater cause, was the failure of the money supply, the withdrawal of money from circulation, bringing a fall of values and the commodity price level. And to restore the money supply withdrawn Congress provided for four different forms of currency measures—the remonetization of silver, the revaluation of gold, resort to Federal Reserve notes, and for the issue of United States currency notes.

The revaluation-of-gold plan is one of the forms of currency legislation enacted at the special session of Congress to remedy the panic and will restore the volume of money withdrawn from circulation as effectively as the remonetization of silver or resort to Federal Reserve notes or the issue of United States noninterest currency notes, other alternative measures provided for. When the revaluation steps have been taken, the currency operations completed, and the additional money issued on the increased value of gold the relative value of money and the commodity price level will have been restored and the way will be open for prosperity to return, responsive to the enterprise and energies of the people.

The currency legislation enacted by Congress and declared for and entered upon by the President is the most forward step taken to recover public control over the issue and the volume of money maintained in circulation in a hundred years, or since Jackson vetoed the private so-called "United States Bank." When this system is completed and carried into full operation under a good-faith administration the measure will stand out a remarkable legislative achievement for the time and under the conditions which formulated.

The declared object and purpose of this legislation is to bring a rise of commodity prices and values; a return of earnings and income to industry; a restoration of the debt, tax, and interest-paying power; and the buying and consuming power of the people. And the declared goal and object to be reached is the general 1926 commodity price level. It must be first realized and understood that money values and commodity values are always relative and opposite; that there can be no such relation as high money and high commodity values at the same time; that if money values are high, commodity values are relatively low; and the higher money values rise the lower commodity values will fall. And if commodity values are too low, it is because money values are too high.

Our problem, therefore, involves the problem of prices, the problem of the general price level, the relative value of money and commodities, the control of the money supply for a restoration and stabilization of prices measured in money. The one most important function or effect of the money-stabilization facilities provided is to take from manipulating financiers the power to control values and the price level and recover that power back to the people. The power to control the price level now rests with the Federal Reserve Board, representing private banking interests, with no responsibility for the public welfare. Under the proposed legislation the power to stabilize money and thereby to control prices would rest with the Secretary of the Treasury and be brought nearer within public control, until full control is recovered back to Congress, where it belongs.

And it must be further realized and understood that, in the consideration of this legislation, we are dealing with a great economic law, the immutable law of supply and demand, and involving not only commodity prices but the relative value of money as well. We are theoretically increasing the supply of gold by increasing its monetary value to neutralize an increased demand and thereby to bring back and restore an equilibrium of the money supply and the general commodity price level.

It is therefore necessary and proper to know, realize, and understand something of the condition we are trying to meet, the cause of the increased demand upon gold, the movements and operations which brought on the demand, the means and facilities used, and the object thereby to be gained. After the close of the great World War, certain international financiers and bankers holding the World War bonds and claims, beginning with the secret bankers' meeting held May 18, 1920, in Washington, D.C., organized a secret, concerted movement to bring all the World War nations to make demands upon gold for money. This movement was organized and promoted, assuming a movement for currency reform and to establish an international money standard. But the real object and purpose of which was to increase and multiply the value of certain bonds and war-debt claims held by a World War bond syndicate by increasing and multiplying the value of the money in which they were paid. Under and through a secret gentleman's agreement, and in pursuance of this purpose, the nations were lead in concerted action to make demand upon gold for money increasing the demand vastly out of proportion to the gold supply in existence or the supply available for money.

But gold was not only increased and multiplied in value without a decrease in the value of the monetary unit by a corresponding increase in the number of dollars, but there was a simultaneous contraction and withdrawal of money from circulation, producing a double harmful force and effect in forcing down commodity values and the price level. The combined effect was multiplied manyfold, not only the international debts upon the nations measured in labor and the products of the labor, in which all debts in the last analysis must be paid, but to double and multiply upon the people of every World War nation in the world all taxes assessed and fixed charges, as well as private debts and money obligations. But this harmful and baneful effect did not only multiply the debts upon the people, but the fall of values and the price level, forced by the increased demand upon gold, made taxes and debts absorb all income and earnings, leaving the people with little or no surplus over, and destroying their buying and consuming power. This increased demand upon gold without an increase of the monetary units multiplied the burdens of debt in crushing weight upon the people, driving nations to default their obligations and individuals to insolvency and bankrupty, and brought on this world panic or depression.

Under the laws of supply and demand the increased and multiplied demand for gold, without an increase in the supply of gold, the value of gold was made to rise until the value of gold was doubled and tripled over the general commodity values and the price level. And with money tied to gold, money values doubled. And under monetary and economic laws, as fixed and certain as life and death, the price level was forced down to a ruinously low level. With the increased and multiplied value of gold without reduction of the gold contents of the dollar and a corresponding increase in the amount of money in the number of dollars issued upon gold, the value and purchasing power of the dollar was made to rise and increase in value with gold, changing the relative value of money and commodities until money was doubled and multiplied in value and commodity values were reduced to the vanishing point.

The practical effect of the revaluation of gold upon money and the commodity price level, when the operations contemplated are completed, as provided for in this bill, will be the same as if new gold mines had been discovered and the gold supply had been doubled which would double the money supply and which in turn would double relative values of commodities and the general price level. Money issued upon gold is not issued upon the quantity or corpus of the metal, but upon the value, real or assumed. If the same supply of gold is revalued and its value doubled, the supply of gold is doubled for the purpose of issuing money.

The only part which is intricate or complex in the revaluation gold plan is the operations and medium of money through which the increased value of gold is carried from gold to other commodities. This increased value is carried from gold by increasing the number of monetary units and increasing the number of dollars issued and based upon the same gold, which increases the number of dollars relative to commodities being exchanged. The revaluation, increasing the price of gold, is to raise the price of gold measured in money units or dollars, and to require the same gold to support and maintain a greater number of dollars in circulation. The revaluation, increasing the price of gold in money, is to and will produce the opposite effect measured in labor and the products of labor. Such revaluation will lower the relative price of gold measured by commodities and labor products. Gold will be cheaper and commodities higher because gold will buy less commodities and commodities will buy more gold.

There is a difference in operations and effect in the revaluation of gold to devaluate the value of the dollar externally; that is, in foreign exchange and abroad, and to devaluate the dollar to raise prices here within our own country. The dollar will be taken or accepted abroad for the gold it represents under the international gold standard and for which it can be exchanged. If the gold contents of the dollar is reduced it will exchange for less gold and be devalued. As the dollar is not money of the foreign realm it can and will be taken for no other use.

But merely reducing the gold contents of the dollar will not of itself revaluate the dollar here, or, in other words, raise values and the price level. Without an increased supply of currency issued upon the increased value of gold there will be no devaluation and rise of prices. If the volume of money in circulation is increased or augmented by bank credit here in domestic commerce and trade, which regulates and controls prices, the dollar will still pay and satisfy 100 cents on debts, taxes, and contract obligations regardless of its theoretical gold contents, and it will be taken for such use and purpose. Until such increase of currency is issued upon the increased value of gold or until such bank credit is expanded there will be no rise of the commodity price level and the goal of a higher price level will not be reached or realized. We are off the gold standard, but it will be necessary to increase the currency corresponding to the increased value of gold to make devaluation of the dollar effective and to bring a rise of values and the price level to reach and realize the goal of this legislation.

The ownership and possession of gold is a necessary incident to the recovery of the power to issue and control money to be exercised by the Government itself. And the right is upheld and sustained not only under the principles of eminent domain but under the necessary and incidental power of the more specific authority to issue and control the value of money.

With money based upon gold and controlled and stabilized by and through gold, the seizure and possession of gold becomes vital, indispensable, and inherent and, without which revaluation and stabilization, would be a mere gesture or maneuver and without tangible force and effect. Gold would be left to be manipulated and monopolized, exported abroad to bring a scarcity or imported to cause an oversupply, and the dollar would follow gold fluctuation as it follows gold demand today and the managed dollar would soon depart like a bird escaping from its confinement.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the figures "1934."

Mr. Chairman, I realize that little can be said at this time which will change the action of the House in respect to the bill now under consideration. I realize that the request of the President, the decision of the majority leadership to consider the bill today, and the temper of the majority assure passage by the House before adjournment this evening.

Nevertheless, I desire to state, insofar as I am concerned, that it is impossible to support the pending measure in its present form.

When this Congress was created by our forefathers, it was created in large measure as a check against ill-considered or overhasty action by the executive branch of the Government. In respect to a measure of such tremendous importance as that now under consideration, it seems to me that the Members of this House and the people of the Nation as a whole are entitled at least to a clear-cut exposition of the purposes and, more particularly, of the implications in the bill under consideration. It seems to me, further, in the light of that exposition they are entitled to the benefit of the most authoritative testimony that can be obtained in this country. We have had no such exposition. We have had no such testimony. We have had nothing that can be fairly characterized as adequate hearings. To consider this bill under these conditions seems to me a failure in the obligation of this House to the country as a whole.

The far-reaching character of this legislation cannot, in my judgment, be exaggerated. It contemplates a departure from a currency system in effect in this country from time immemorial.

It provides for a severe blow to the Federal Reserve System. Instead of merely taking, through franchise tax or otherwise, the equivalent of the enhanced value of gold in the hands of the Federal Reserve System, as a result of devaluation, as other nations have done under similar circumstances, it would take over the entire gold supply in the hands of the System in exchange for so-called "gold certificates", which are, in fact, little more than warehouse receipts for a varying quantity of gold, and would place in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury such powers as to make it possible to negative in large measure the regulatory functions of the System, leaving little more than machinery to carry out the wishes of the Secretary.

Almost every nation in the world provides machinery for the control of its currency which, in theory at least, is entirely distinct from the government and political pressure. This bill would place the control of our currency, in large measure, in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury in the most difficult times. The dangers involved in subjecting the currency to Executive control must be considered today in connection with provisions of the Thomas amendment, specifically continued in force by this bill and the tremendous deficits by which the National Government is at this time confronted.

The bill contemplates an extraordinary delegation of power to the Secretary of the Treasury—$4,000,000,000 in gold, 40 percent of the world's supply, with the possibility of the issue of Treasury notes in respect to a substantial portion of it; a $2,000,000,000 fund for the alleged purpose of stabilizing the exchange value of the dollar, carrying with it powers far in excess of those essential for the purpose specified; authority to engage in open-market operations, both at home and abroad, with the possibility of artificial support for the market in connection with the issue of further Government obligations; control in detail of all gold within the country; exemption from review by any other officer of the Government; other power contributing to an enormous influence in respect to the life and well-being of every American citizen.

The bill also contemplates a blind, blanket approval, ratification and confirmation of all actions, regulations, rules, orders, and proclamations heretofore made or issued by the President of the United States or the Secretary of the Treasury under the Emergency Banking Act or the Thomas amendment.

I shall not dwell again upon the matter of devaluation. The importance of this matter to every wage earner, to everyone receiving a pension, to every holder of a life-insurance policy, to every savings-bank depositor has been emphasized again and again.

We are urged to support this bill as a step in the direction of stabilization. I sincerely hope that this may prove to be a fact. I submit, however, that there is no evidence in the bill itself or in the message accompanying the bill which justifies any such conclusion. The bill gives the President no authority in respect to stabilization which he does not already enjoy. No specific figure for stabilization is provided. The right to a variation of 16⅔ percent is specifically reserved. No evidence is offered to justify the suggested maximum figure of 60 percent. If too low, it may prove extremely costly to the Government. No assurance is given that requests may not subsequently be made to reduce the minimum figure specified. No provision is made for the elimination of the power to issue greenbacks under the Thomas amendment.

Mr. Chairman, there is no measure that I would rather vote for at this time than for a measure contemplating prompt stabilization. I have stated repeatedly and publicly that in my judgment the President of the United States could make no greater contribution to the national welfare than through a currency upon which the people of the Nation can with certainty rely.

This is not the kind of stabilization which I had hoped for. This is not the kind of stabilization in my judgment essential at this time to permit business to go forward with confidence under the forces of recuperation which have been striving to assert themselves upon this continent for a period of at least 12 months. I regret that I cannot conscientiously support the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. SOMERS of New York. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to unnecessarily cut off anybody from debating the merits of this measure, but I think we should get along. There are other sections to be read which will give gentlemen opportunity to be heard, and I ask unanimous consent that debate upon this section close in 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. Needless to say, I am personally in full accord with this measure. It accomplishes the very desirable end of placing our gold, where it always belonged, in the Treasury of the United States. I am not in accord with the statement of a member of the opposition that probably not 10 men on this side of the House know what this is all about. It happens to be a subject with which I am more or less familiar and which I have carefully studied, a subject with which I find many Members familiar. I am going to support the bill.

I call attention now to two or three things that occurred here today that I think should be emphasized. First, several gentlemen on the opposition have stressed the idea that in reducing the gold content of the dollar a 60-cent dollar would be the result. The measure of value of a dollar in this country is how much taxes it will pay. Who of you has the hardihood to say that we cannot take these dollars to the Treasury of the United States and pay our income taxes, or to the treasury of any political subdivision of the United States and pay other taxes? That being true, our American dollar remains a full 100-percent dollar.

Secondly, the gentleman from New York made the astounding statement that the people of the United States were bringing pressure upon this Congress to repudiate all obligations and to take from the rich and give to the poor. If that represents the attitude of mind preserved on the Republican side and if the gentleman is an exponent of it, I am sure the people of the United States are not going to appreciate that compliment.

Third, we have heard a great deal of weeping over the burial of our gold now in the privately owned Federal Reserve bank and putting it into the Treasury of the United States, where it has always belonged and where it should always be held. I, for one, can weep no salt tears. The Federal Reserve banks have enjoyed this monopoly long enough. It is high time our gold was made the servant, not the master of all the people.

Let me reiterate, I am going to vote for the bill, and I hope every man in the House who has the interest of all the people at heart will do likewise. This is the time to uphold our great President's hands to the end that his program for recovery and reconstruction be allowed to work out in an orderly, step-by-step manner.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. (a) Upon the approval of this act all right, title, and interest, and every claim of the Federal Reserve Board, of every Federal Reserve bank, and of every Federal Reserve agent, in and to any and all gold coin and gold bullion shall pass to and are hereby vested in the United States; and in payment therefor credits in equivalent amounts in dollars are hereby established in the Treasury in the accounts authorized under the sixteenth paragraph of section 16 of the Federal Reserve Act, as heretofore and by this act amended (U.S.C., title 12, sec. 467). Balances in such accounts shall be payable in gold certificates, which shall be in such form and in such denominations as the Secretary of the Treasury may determine. All gold so transferred, not in the possession of the United States, shall be held in custody for the United States and delivered upon the order of the Secretary of the Treasury; and the Federal Reserve Board, the Federal Reserve banks, and the Federal Reserve agents shall give such instructions and shall take such action as may be necessary to assure that such gold shall be so held and delivered.

(b) Section 16 of the Federal Reserve Act, as amended, is further amended by striking out the word "gold" where it first appears in the last sentence of the first paragraph (U.S.C., title 12, sec. 411) of said section 16, and inserting in lieu thereof the words "lawful money"; and by striking out the phrase "in gold or lawful money", where it appears in said sentence; by striking out the word "gold" and the ensuing comma, and the words "gold or" wherever in section 16 they are immediately followed by the words "gold certificates"; by striking out the word "gold" in the first sentence of the third paragraph (U.S.C., title 12, sec. 413) of said section 16 where it follows the words "shall be counted as part of the", by inserting after the word "gold" the word "certificates" wherever it now appears in said section 16, not immediately followed by the word "certificates", except in the sixteenth paragraph (U.S.C., title 12, sec. 467) of said section 16 and except where the same is stricken out by this section; by striking out the word "coin" where it appears after the phrase "deposits of gold" in the first sentence of the sixteenth paragraph; by striking out the words "gold coin or" where they appear after the words "shall be payable in" in the third sentence of the sixteenth paragraph, and by striking out all of the third sentence of the sixteenth paragraph after the words "such Federal Reserve agent" and inserting in lieu thereof a period; and by striking out the words "gold deposits" in the eighteenth paragraph and inserting in lieu thereof the words "deposits made under this section."

Mr. LAMNECK. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LAMNECK: On page 2, line 5, after the word "certificates", insert "which shall upon the face of said certificates provide the Treasurer of the United States will pay to bearer on demand $———— in gold or its equivalent in value."

On page 2, line 6, after the word "in", strike out "such form and in."

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PATMAN. As I understand it, section 2 ends on page 8.

The CHAIRMAN. Section 2, on the Union Calendar bill, ends at the end of line 17, on page 3 of the bill.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SNELL. I should like to ask if there are two prints of this bill?

The CHAIRMAN. There may have been some confusion on the part of Members with reference to that matter. There was a committee print of the bill, which for some reason was circulated, but the official bill we are considering is Union Calendar 83.

Mr. SNELL. Now, that is what got everybody mixed up.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAMNECK] is recognized.

Mr. LAMNECK. Mr. Chairman, this is a simple amendment. In the first place, the provisions of the bill are not specific. It reads, "Shall be payable in gold certificates." I think we should adopt my amendment, because, when the time comes to redeem them we may not have the gold with which to redeem them, and I think when England gets through with this stabilization fund in a year or so we will not have any. Therefore my proposition is to redeem these certificates in gold or in value equivalent to gold. We could use many things. We could use silver to redeem the certificates, if we wanted to do so.

I also think the Secretary of the Treasury should not have the right to write the form of the certificate. I think we should be specific, and have Congress write the form in which these certificates should be printed.

That is all I have to say. The amendment is very simple and has a very important bearing on this bill.

Mr. BUSBY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAMNECK. I yield.

Mr. BUSBY. Does not the gentleman understand that the President has in mind these certificates shall not be redeemable in gold and that they shall not be redeemable in anything except lawful money?

Mr. LAMNECK. No; I do not have that understanding.

Mr. BUSBY. I may explain that that is his specific statement in regard to the matter.

Mr. LAMNECK. I yield back the balance of my time, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. SOMERS of New York. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

I ask the House to vote down this amendment principally because we have not had time to see its real effect. Secondly, I suspect at first blush it would defeat the purposes and intent of this act. I do not say that the amendment has no merit. I do think, however, that our committee, having held hearings during the last 3 or 4 days, would have been glad to have that matter presented to them at that time. Since it was not presented, I can do nothing but request the House at this time, in order to support this bill completely, to vote it down.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAMNECK].

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. The Secretary of the Treasury shall, by regulations issued hereunder, with the approval of the President, prescribe the conditions under which gold may be acquired and held, transported, melted or treated, imported, exported, or earmarked (a) for industrial, professional, and artistic use; (b) by the Federal Reserve banks for the purpose of settling international balances; and (c) for such other purposes as in his judgment are not inconsistent with the purposes of this act. Gold in any form may be acquired, transported, melted or treated, imported, exported, or earmarked or held in custody for foreign or domestic account (except on behalf of the United States) only to the extent permitted by, and subject to the conditions prescribed in, or pursuant to such regulations. Such regulations may exempt from the provisions of this section, in whole or in part, gold situated in the Philippine Islands or other places beyond the limits of the continental United States.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I have sent to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. PATMAN: On page 4, line 1, after the word "act" and the period which follows it, insert "Provided, That no part of said gold shall be exported to the Bank for International Settlements to be used as a reserve or for the purpose of aiding or assisting such bank or any similar banking institution in any way."

AGAINST INTERNATIONAL BANK

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, no one objects that this gold be used for the purpose intended. I can see no reason why the committee should object to the amendment I have proposed. It will merely prevent exportation of the people's gold to the Bank for International Settlements, where it could be used as a basis for credit for all nations. I am not yet ready for the United States to join an international bank. I am not ready for our country to use our gold and our resources and the credit of all the people of this country to help all the countries of the world. This amendment is intended for the purpose of preventing the Secretary of the Treasury from exporting this gold to the Bank for International Settlements, to be used as a reserve, or for the purpose of assisting the Bank for International Settlements in any way with this gold, or any similar banking institution. I am for the bill and expect to vote for it, with or without this amendment, but I do believe the adoption of this amendment will improve the bill.

We have just about taken the power away from the few large bankers of this country who have been controlling the issuance and distribution of our money. We have, at least, taken long steps in that direction. If we now place in their hands and in their control any vehicle to get back the same grip upon the throats of the American people that they had in the recent past, we shall not have accomplished a great deal by the enactment of this measure.

I sincerely trust the committee will accept this amendment. I do not think the chairman of the committee will contend that it is the purpose of this act ever to permit this gold to be exported to be used by nations all over the world or to allow our credit to be used by nations all over the world. Therefore, if this object is not in view, why not adopt this amendment, which will prohibit this gold reserve from being used for the purpose of assisting, or engaging in the operation of, any international bank? I sincerely trust the committee will accept the amendment.

Mr. SOMERS of New York and Mr. McFADDEN rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York, the chairman of the committee.

Mr. SOMERS of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, in connection with the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN], I am quite in accord with it and would call the attention of the leadership on the other side to that part of the President's message in which he refers to the very subject. I am quoting from the President's message to Congress on this very measure. I quote:

That the title of all gold be in the Government. The total stock will serve as a permanent and fixed metallic reserve which will change in amount only as far as necessary for the settlement of international balances or as may be required by future agreement among nations of the world for a redistribution of the world stock of monetary gold.

I ask the chairman of the committee whether or not a redistribution of our gold is immediately in contemplation, or whether that is a part of the plan of his administration?

Mr. SOMERS of New York. I will definitely answer the inquiry of the gentleman from Pennsylvania that according to my understanding there is not. Some day there may be. The gentleman's guess is as good as mine; but at the present moment I do not believe the contemplation exists.

Mr. McFADDEN. What does the gentleman mean by what method, by this method?

Mr. SOMERS of New York. The gentleman did not refer to a method, did he? He referred to an agreement.

Mr. McFADDEN. No. I referred to the President's statement to the Congress covering this particular subject. I asked if such a plan was contemplated.

Mr. SOMERS of New York. I confess the gentleman has me confused now. I do not know how he is applying his question. Would the gentleman mind repeating it?

Mr. McFADDEN. As I understood the argument of the gentleman from Texas it was in opposition to the redistribution of the gold of this country through a central agency abroad similar to the Bank for International Settlements. I have quoted from the President's message indicating that this is a possibility, and I am asking the gentleman from New York, chairman of this committee, whether there is any plan for the redistribution of the gold of this country.

Mr. SOMERS of New York. I do not think the President could say definitely that this will never take place. It may take place in the distant future; but I am most positive that he did not anticipate that it would take place in the near future. In fact, there are provisions in the bill to take care of the situation.

Mr. McFADDEN. I say again what I have repeatedly said, that there is a definite plan for the redistribution of the gold of this country and of the world's gold. The plan has been known ever since the establishment of the Bank for International Settlements that through that medium, or one similar to it, eventually the redistribution of gold would take place.

In my remarks this morning, had I been given the opportunity, I would have discussed this plan.

I quote from a speech I delivered in this House on February 10, 1930, when this Bank for International Settlements was organized by the international financial group, J. P. Morgan & Co., the Federal Reserve Bank of New York, Gates W. McGarry, and others of this group.

I quote:

> It is also clear that this international bank will be given the right to deal in gold exchanges and it will have other important international governmental transactions. It is also indicated that there will be a mobilization of the international gold reserves either through the actual deposit of gold reserves in vaults of the international bank or by the process of earmarking and that eventually an international circulating medium will follow.

If the gentleman from New York and the other Members of the House have watched the events that have happened since, they would have observed that there is a definite plan on foot to redistribute the gold of the United States. The Bank for International Settlements has passed upon the plan, and those who intend to do this are only awaiting an opportune time.

I want to know from those who are responsible for this legislation whether or not in this bill such authority is being given to the President or to the Secretary of the Treasury. Unless the bill is changed, it does give the definite authority to the Secretary of the Treasury to redistribute our gold in a central fund mingled with the gold funds of the other countries of the world.

I say to the Membership of this House that when such a step is taken we shall have destroyed one of the most fundamental rights under our form of government; and, so far as I am able to state it, I am absolutely opposed that any such authority be granted. I hope some Member on the Democratic side, who must have the information, will give it to the Committee.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. I yield.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. If we want to protect our gold and make sure that it will stay in this country, we should vote for this amendment, should we not?

Mr. McFADDEN. We certainly should. Unless an amendment of this nature is included in the bill, it will grant authority to do this very thing.

Mr. SOMERS of New York. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, the question brought up by the gentleman from Pennsylvania can be very simply answered. I confess that I think under this bill there is granted the authority he suggests. The question, however, is, Are we likely to use it? Let me call attention to the fact that there is no world condition at present requiring its use; and it does not appear likely that it would be used within the next 15 years. Consequently, Mr. Chairman, I must insist on opposing the amendment.

It might be that a year from now we would change our opinion or our outlook on this matter and want an international settlement. If we incorporate in the bill the amendment of the gentleman from Texas, it might be a little difficult to exercise the power if we had to.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SOMERS of New York. I yield.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. If this power is not to be used for another year, why not prohibit its use for the present and let the President come back a year hence for the authority?

Mr. SOMERS of New York. In my best judgment, it is not in keeping to do a thing like that; and before the debate is closed, I think the gentleman will see the reason why.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. If it is desired to engage with any other nation, or group of nations, in the establishment of an international bank, is not this in itself a question of sufficient importance to engage the attention of Congress?

Mr. SOMERS of New York. I may say to the gentleman from Minnesota that before there was any actual attempt to do that, Congress would discuss it for a very long period.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. But the power is conveyed by the terms of this bill.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SOMERS of New York. I yield.

Mr. PATMAN. Does the gentleman realize this amendment will merely prevent this gold from being exported to an international bank to be used as a reserve?

Mr. SOMERS of New York. Mr. Chairman, I still insist in my opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, we cannot tie the hands of the President with such strings at this particular time; it is not wise from a sound business viewpoint.

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SOMERS of New York. I yield.

Mr. SHOEMAKER. The chairman of the committee still insists that the amendment of the gentleman from Texas should not be adopted.

Mr. SOMERS of New York. I do.

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Can the gentleman give us any constructive argument in favor of his stand?

Mr. SOMERS of New York. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I think this is an inopportune time.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the Chair was in doubt.

The Committee divided; and there were—ayes 123, noes 120.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed as tellers Mr. SOMERS of New York and Mr. PATMAN.

The Committee again divided; and the tellers reported there were—ayes 133, noes 170.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. SOMERS of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. SOMERS of New York. I want to announce that I will make no attempt whatsoever to limit debate at this time, but upon completion of the remarks of the gentleman from Colorado will make the unanimous request that debate on this section be limited.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, the other day we listened to our beloved colleague the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HOWARD] invoke the shades of the idol of his life, William Jennings Bryan, wondering whether the spirit of the great commoner might not now be looking down upon the scene of his earthly labors and witnessing the materializing of his dreams of righteousness in government and in the affairs of men. I could go along with the venerable Nebraskan in much of his journeyings with the man who kept the Democratic Party a militant organization of genuine democracy for 16 years, and until his hands passed the torch of democracy into the hands of another great Democrat.

I could go along with him because I cast my first Presidential vote for Bryan, and my second and fourth Presidential votes.

But when it comes to the realization of dreams I might go back even beyond the daring young crusader from the West, back to a movement which reflected its political and economic philosophy in the thought and molded the opinions of Bryan, the much ridiculed Populist movement of the early nineties.

Three days ago I sat in a committee room and heard one of the great financiers and bankers of America, Mr. Frank A. Vanderlip, advocate a government bank of money issue; the taking over of the money-making function of the Federal Reserve and national banks and the issue by the Government of all money. Forty years ago—yes, less—that man would have been denounced as a wild-eyed fanatic; for what he advocated was the first article of faith in the creed of Populism, the issue and control of all money by the National Government.

This banker went beyond that. He went to lengths never dreamed of by Populists or Greenbackers, because the conditions did not then exist—conditions which have brought this Nation to a parting of the ways as great as that which brought about the Civil War. He advocated the seizure by the Government of all gold, the devaluation of the gold dollar, the appropriation of the profits of the process by the Government, and that no more gold ever be coined; and that no more gold ever be paid out, except in settlement of international trade balances, which means not at all, since these balances are invariably in our favor, and should be always and ever in our favor.

This banker advocated this bill now before the House, this measure without precedent in our history, but not in that of other countries; beyond the imagining of any former platform writers; and yet many people do not know what is happening in this country and are still looking for a sign.

My head is white, but my vision of the future of America is young and bright; a future which will look back upon the era between the close of the Civil War and the day of reckoning in 1929 with the same horror that we look back upon Rome under the Neros and Europe under the feudal barons—an era of financial brigandage, of industrial barbarism, of national exploitation, and of political corruption which will make it the criminal romance of American history.

The Government is going—must go—into the issuance of all money and the control of all banking. Its acquisition of stock ownership in the banks of the country and necessary compliance with the plan for the guarantee of bank deposits will insure its control of the banks of the country. That control will pass from Wall Street to Washington; and when that change is completed, and commercial banking is divorced from investment banking, the speculative orgies which have wrecked the prosperity of this Nation time and again will be matters of history.

This bill deals with another feature of the money question, which is the question exceeding the sum of all other questions, the very root and source of the economic ills of America. Ever since the passage of the National Bank Act in 1862 this banking system, wholly in private control, has been the dominant influence in the life of this Nation. Nearly every act of government touching money has been calculated to build up and strengthen this institution and its private control: the exception clause on the greenback, the credit strengthening act, the demonetization of silver, the resumption of specie payment, the establishment of the gold standard, the creation and maintenance of a huge national debt. Even the Federal Reserve System, designed to stabilize and make available the monetary resources of the Nation and prevent panic and depression, has but tended to strengthen the hand of private ownership over the financial life of the Nation. Its calling in of loans and the reduction of its circulating medium by more than a billion dollars in the space of a year brought on the terrible deflation of 1920 and 1921, and the use of its circulating medium and credit furnished much of the gas for the balloon which exploded in October 1929 and littered the Nation with the debris of its so-called "prosperity."

Now, today this institution, privately owned, in the hands of the leading bankers of the country, whose private interests are naturally their primary concern, holds in its vaults the major portion of the gold reserves of the country and practically one third of the gold supply of the world. On this deposit it can, but does not, issue and maintain money in circulation. Recent figures have shown that there is less money in circulation in the country today than there was on March 4.

Every effort to expand that circulation has failed. Here are two notable instances. When Congress passed the first Home Loan Act in 1932 it incorporated therein an amendment empowering the banks of the country to issue up to a billion dollars of currency based on their holdings of Government bonds. President Hoover in his solicitude for the integrity of the currency declared that such an amendment would weaken and discredit it and imperil the gold standard, and that if the act was passed with the amendment in it he would veto it. But the act came to him with the amendment in the last days of the session when the veto meant the loss of an act very close to his heart in the face of a national election and he swallowed it, amendment and all.

I thought the weakness of that amendment was its permissive character. I felt that the issuance of the billion dollars in currency should be mandatory. And I watched. I failed to perceive any inflation of the currency. I failed to see the foundations of the Nation's credit crumble. I failed to notice people refusing to give up things for money because the money was worthless. Not then being a Member of Congress, I wrote a Member of this House, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN], several months after the passage of the act, and asked him for information as to what quantity of currency had been issued under the billion-dollar amendment. He replied about $39,000,000. In other words, the amendment was practically a total failure.

We come now to the permissive powers granted the Federal Reserve System by this Congress in the inflation amendment to the farm bill, whereby the system was authorized to go into the open markets and purchase Government securities to the extent of $3,000,000,000 and issue its money therefor, so that the circulating medium of the country might be expanded and business stimulated. Has the failure of this amendment to expand the currency, to inflate to the extent of one dollar, been due to the fact that there is no demand for money, no need for money? Ask the home owners of the country, mortgaged for $12,000,000,000; ask the farmers of the country, mortgaged for $20,000,000,000; ask business and industry languishing and dying for the want of the life-giving fluid, not to be had for any security; ask the moneyless millions who have almost forgotten what money is.

It is said that some seven or eight hundred million dollars has been issued under this authority, but the hand that puts it out today may take it back tomorrow, and usually does. What is done is determined not by the needs of business or the dire wants and necessities of the people but by the interests of the owners of an institution which pays 6 percent dividends on its stocks, rain or shine, and which at the time of the special session of this Congress had accumulated an enormous surplus of $250,000,000 during a money famine, locked up in its vaults.

The governor of a Federal Reserve bank, testifying only yesterday before the House Committee on Coinage, said that the reserves in the Federal Reserve banks had been increased by some $900,000,000 as the result of their purchase of Government securities under the Thomas inflation amendment to the farm bill; the reserves, mind you, where apparently all of the money of the country is, except when lured out by the bait of another issue of interest-bearing, tax-exempt, Government bonds. Gold and bonds, bonds and gold, the only kinds of property in the country apparently worth anything.

The same authority stated that there are $3,000,000,000 in Federal Reserve bank notes now outstanding—he meant instanding—and that the gold reserve behind outstanding Reserve bank notes was frequently 80 or 90 percent and even over 100 percent; whereas a reserve of 40 percent is all that the law requires, and that reserve not 40 percent in gold, but 40 percent in lawful money of the United States, and all of its money is lawful.

There is something radically wrong with a monetary system under which with a gold reserve of 100 percent there is no money in circulation in the country; and mind you, this was not 100 percent under a 50-cent gold dollar, but under a gold dollar that was worth $2. Even at the old price of gold, $20.67 an ounce, the Government could have placed the four and one quarter billion dollars in gold in the Federal Treasury and have issued nearly $11,000,000,000 in currency against it and still have a 40-percent gold reserve. Still money is too scarce and too dear to be available for any form of legitimate investment except investment in interest-bearing tax-free Government bonds, and even for these the banks are requiring higher and higher rates of interest and the Government must resort to administrative and legislative tricks to insure against failure to float a bond issue. There have been times when I could not help wishing that the day might come when the Government could not float a bond issue. There have been times when I could not help wishing that I might get up and read in the papers some morning that the Treasury had failed to float a bond issue. I know that would be a blue morning, but I have felt that I could whistle down the street that morning assured that at least if we had not turned that mythical corner, we had hit solid bottom.

The country would survive the ordeal. It survived it just 40 years ago, when the Federal Treasury could not publicly float a popular bond issue among the people of only $100,000,000. Now it must be ten billions, just 100 times more than it failed to float 40 years ago. And if you will go back to the files of the Philadelphia Saturday Evening Post of 1904 or 1905 in the Library of Congress you will find the shameful story of how the Government of this great Nation was rescued from its plight. You will find that the founder of the House of Morgan, the father of the present emperor of finance, came from Wall Street to Washington and in the office of the President of the United States showed the President how, under the authority of a long-forgotten and obscure statute, those bonds might be disposed of at private sale, and they were so sold for several dollars less than par and underwritten by a syndicate of Wall Street bankers and resold for several dollars more than par, and with a private profit of several million dollars. What a spectacle! The credit of a handful of Wall Street bankers worth more than the credit of this great Nation, the financial resources of a handful of Wall Street bankers greater than the financial resources of this great Nation. That story is authentic, because it was written and published by Grover Cleveland, who was President of the United States when the deal was made. And back in those days a voice in the West declaimed against the domination of this great Nation by a handful of bankers in one small street. But it declaimed in vain; and now, after 40 years of alleged progress, we find the Government of the United States today at its wits end, resorting to the creation of mathematical money to secure the means to pay its bills and preserve its credit. I can recall when the question of perpetuating or of wiping out a national debt of three or four hundred million dollars was a national issue in a campaign for the Presidency; now it is $30,000,000,000; now it is 75 times greater than that debt, and the end is not yet.

The debt structure of this country is characterized as staggering. It is more than that. It is fantastic. It is as far beyond human comprehension as the magnitude of the universe. We can no more grasp it than we can grasp the Einstein theory. It will not be paid by cutting the gold dollar in two, or by cutting it in four. It can never be paid. I listened to the president of a Federal land bank not long since tell the farmers of my State that they could never pay their debts, not even with good crops and high prices. He said Congress, by a recent amendment to the bankruptcy laws, has shown you the way to pay your debts and it is the only way you can ever pay them. He could have made the same statement to every other class of debtors in this country; and yet men will haggle over nonessentials involved in the question whether we will split this handful of gold in two and make two handfuls, mathematically speaking, so that a debt structure of $235,000,000,000 will rest on a base of $8,000,000,000 instead of $4,000,000,000. It is said that modern engineering is not able even to conceive, let alone execute, the methods by which the ancients built the Pyramids of Egypt, but, in my judgment, the moderns have more than duplicated the miracle of the ancients; they have constructed a pyramid which rests upon its apex instead of its base.

So after 70 years of the experiment of the issuance, control, and circulation of money by private organisms we have the spectacle of a sovereign Government on its knees to the money masters for the means whereby to carry on, offering them now exorbitant interest rates to buy its bonds, until soon the major item in the Budget will not be $1,000,000,000 for the Veterans' Administration, as formerly, but $1,000,000 for interest to bondholders. I like to think that the day will come in America when we will have a citizenship so enlightened and so in control of the vital functions of their national life that they will look back on this system with a pitying smile.

This bill is at least another step toward bringing about a new deal in banking and finance. The first step was the Bank Moratorium Act. The second the repeal of the gold-payment clause, going off the gold standard. The third the inflation amendment to the farm bill. The fourth the insurance of bank deposits. This is the fifth but by no means the last step.

The golden treasure which belongs to all the people will be taken from the strong boxes of private banking and placed in the National Treasury. The gold dollar will be devalued 40 percent, and I apprehend shortly 50 percent, and the profit placed on the public ledger, where it belongs. If there is any kind of property in this country that ought to be nationalized, it is the money of the country. Next to the power to maintain law and order, to maintain orderly government, the most important power affecting the lives and happiness of the people is the power to issue, to regulate, and to control money. If there is any form of property which is, and of right ought to be, the property of all the people—and I mean that in the collective sense, in the sense of government—it is money.

I am equally in favor of the stabilization fund of $2,000,000,000, to be set up under this law, to buy and sell gold and securities and to protect our money and commerce in foreign exchange. On this feature I was much impressed by the statement of Mr. Vanderlip that a telephone call from London to New York could do much more damage to the value and stability of our foreign exchange and our foreign commerce than a whole fleet of ships. I cannot talk the language of such men, but I can understand it. I am like a judge who may not know what the law is but knows it when he hears it expounded. I have not heard what I consider a single valid objection to the gold policy of the President or to the stabilization fund. The principal objection to the fund is that this power will be vested in one man, the Secretary of the Treasury, which means in the final analysis in the President.

An opponent of this control, one of the able leaders on the Republican side, held up to the Democratic majority the awful example of Mr. Mellon. He said to them, "Mr. Mellon is responsible for many of you being here." He asked, in substance, how we would like to wake up some fine day and find all this power lodged in the hands of another Mellon. First, let us thank him for his repudiation of Mellonism. And next, let us reply that when we have another Mellon at the head of the Treasury, we will also have another Mellon in the White House and another Mellon party in control of the Government. And if and when that catastrophe happens again in this country, it will be just as it was before, when all of the agencies set up under the administration of President Wilson to protect the people—the Federal Reserve System, the Federal Tariff Commission, the Federal Trade Commission, and all the other commissions—were prostituted to the service of what Grover Cleveland well called the predatory interests. The price of liberty is still eternal vigilance. If the people want a government responsive to their needs and interests; if they want to preserve government of, for, and by the people, they must keep eternally awake. No system will work in the hands of its enemies except for its enemies. I am for the bill as is. [Applause.]

Mr. SOMERS of New York. Mr. Chairman, I ask that debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Chairman, I am going to vote for this bill. [Applause.]

To me, and I believe to my constituents, this will be a happy day.

First, I wish to call your attention to the very liberal order which was published by our President in which he recognized the injustice which the Economy Act did to our veterans. I want to stand on this floor and express my public thanks to our President for that just effort and that just ruling which he enunciated. I know most of the Members of this House would like their constituents to know the effective work they are doing in assisting our President in this victory. I am in favor of this bill because it is along the lines of legislation I have so earnestly and energetically advocated.

I am more than pleased to support the administration in this measure which withdraws all gold from the control and domination of the international-banking ring of Wall Street. From this angle this bill is a Babe Ruth home run. Heretofore, in our legislative efforts, we Democrats, under the new deal, have been making an occasional hit which has contributed in great measure to our present forward movement. We have been, however, making a myriad of foul plays through applications of the gag rule. The Congress is rapidly getting into disrepute with the people because of such gag rules. I hope that we will make no more foul tips of this kind but that under the leadership of our President we will make at least two more home runs to win the world's series for the American people. Babe Ruth made as many as three home runs in a single game in the world's series. Our President will surely make two more. Let us cheer and encourage him to drive a home run to the remonetization of silver. This kind of a home run is most essential in building up our foreign trade. Another home run, however, on the part of the President, to control credit and extend loans directly to the people at a low rate of interest is very essential and will positively sew up the game. This ball of Government credit should be so effectively lost in the bleachers that the international bankers of Wall Street, who have stolen billions of deposits of the American people and their investments, may never again get their iniquitous fingers on it. We need at least these two additional home runs to win the game for the people and to make the new deal actually real.

There are other objectives which we should not overlook—the elimination of the Federal Reserve System and withdrawal of all tax-exempt provisions on all bonds. We are winning with Roosevelt. Since the administration has the compass set on the course of monetary stabilization and credit control, I will be more than an enthusiastic supporter. Heretofore we Democrats have been aiming in the direction of the target. With our majority we should fire at the bullseye and save our people from increased taxation by common sense methods. We should refrain absolutely from borrowing from entrenched wealth to carry on Government and to bring relief to our people. Why borrow from entrenched wealth when we have the power to tax wealth, which we should do rather than tax the common people and thus add to our present burdens?

I am now going to give you a picture of what you are doing by this gold devaluation. I have here a bunch of nuggets and a cross of gold. I obtained this bunch of nuggets 30 years ago in Alaska, and by good providence I have kept them away from Pierpont Morgan and the banking group, and they are still mine. [Laughter and applause.]

The devaluation features of this bill do not exactly meet with my approval, but as I have confidence in the President on this subject I am gladly voting "yes" for this entire measure.

If it is legal and just to devalue gold to 60 percent of its present value, why not devalue it to 10 percent of its present value in order to wipe out debts which are the crux of our entire economic burden?

Under this bill the value of these nuggets I have here has almost doubled. Now, when we consider that Great Britain produces seven times more gold than America, it is readily understood by even the illiterate that gold devaluation adds to the potential British wealth 7 to 1 over the United States. By gold devaluation we are reducing the war debt owed America and at the same time reducing the seventeen billions of private debts owed our citizens by Europe. As the most of this private debt is owed to such individuals as Morgan, Mellon, Baruch, and others, I have no sympathy for them in their loss. They had absolutely no sympathy for the American people in their crooked manipulations in the stock market, and in the myriad of bank failures. Perhaps, if the truth were known, these same individuals would be found to own the controlling stock in the British gold mines, and under this gold devaluation will be doubling their natural income anyway.

Objection has been made to this bill because it gives the Secretary of the Treasury exclusive control of gold and the handling of the $2,000,000,000 stabilization fund. Is there any individual who would not prefer to have such control in an officer who is subject to impeachment by the Congress rather than to have the control of gold and credit vested in the hands of false stewards, such as are typified in men of the Morgan, Wiggins, and Insull type? Paraphrasing the words of Patrick Henry, give me financial control under the domination of my own Government rather than under the domination of the despicable international thieves whose only flag is the American dollar, the British pound, or the French franc.

SEC. 4. Any gold withheld, acquired, transported, melted or treated, imported, exported, or earmarked or held in custody, in violation of this act or of any regulations issued hereunder, or licenses issued pursuant thereto, shall be forfeited to the United States, and may be seized and condemned by like proceedings as those provided by law for the forfeiture, seizure, and condemnation of property imported into the United States contrary to law; and in addition any person failing to comply with the provisions of this act or of any such regulations or licenses shall be subject to a penalty equal to twice the value of the gold in respect of which such failure occurred.

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, at some time during the consideration of the first nine sections of this bill I feel it is highly proper that at least on behalf of myself and my colleague from California [Mr. ELTSE], minority members of this committee, I should make a statement pertaining to the nine sections and their effect upon the Federal Reserve System.

We have firmly believed that the Federal Reserve should not be permitted to take one penny of profit out of devaluation. We have believed that a certain part of this gold held by the Federal Reserve System is a trust fund, not as property of the Reserve System but as security for Federal Reserve currency which is outstanding and in the pockets of the American people. We have believed if there were devaluation of 40 percent, then 40 percent of that stock of gold should be returned to the Treasury. We are not trying to reach this by any process of amendment, because we realize the impossibility of accomplishing this purpose in the House.

Here is the situation: Maybe the Federal Reserve System has not met its responsibilities; in fact, I do not believe it has. The governor of the Philadelphia bank told us yesterday that the Federal Reserve banks held some three and a half billion dollars of gold, with less than $3,000,000,000 of outstanding currency. Under the Federal Reserve Act it was perfectly proper for the Federal Reserve banks to have outstanding currency with 40 percent of gold back of such currency. In other words, if the Federal Reserve banks were extending the credit which they could extend under the Federal Reserve Act, with this amount of gold they could now have outstanding some seven or eight billion dollars instead of less than $3,000,000,000 in currency outstanding. But if the Federal Reserve banks have failed to meet their responsibility, the manly thing to do is to either abolish the System or change the System. It is a cowardly thing to take the gold away from them which is security for currency which is held by the people of the United States under the faith of the United States and under the faith of the Federal Reserve Act itself. Reaching it in this way we believe is wrong.

The Federal Reserve Act was enacted by a Democratic administration, and the truth is that when a Democratic administration placed the control of money in the hands of the Federal Reserve banks and took that power away from Congress, they deviated from the Constitution, and today you are trying to correct that wrong by forcing the Federal Reserve banks to break faith with those who today hold their currency. You are trying to correct a wrong by going one step further, namely, taking the control of money entirely out of the hands of Congress and placing it in the hands of one man—the Secretary of the Treasury.

If the Federal Reserve Act was a mistake, in the first instance, this is a greater one. I say to you that the manly way to have met the Federal Reserve errors or mistakes which have been made, if any, would be to change the act in an open, courageous manner and not reach out by arbitrary force and take gold—not so much the property of the Federal Reserve but gold which it holds as a sacred trust to secure its own outstanding currency—which is now owned by the people of this country.

In taking away this currency the wrong is not so much against the banks as it is against the people of this country who own the Federal Reserve currency. [Applause.]

Mr. CLAIBORNE. Mr. Chairman and members of the Committee, it has been said today that the President wishes this bill passed. It has also been said today that many of the voters of the country wish this bill passed. In such an emergency what is the duty of a Representative?

You will recall that in 1774 Edmund Burke, speaking to the voters of Bristol, had this to say:

> Certainly, gentlemen, it ought to be the happiness and glory of a Representative to live in the strictest union, the closest correspondence, and the most unreserved communication with his constituents. Their wishes ought to have great weight with him; their opinion, high respect; their business, unremitted attention. It is his duty to sacrifice his repose, his pleasure, his satisfaction, to theirs; and above all, ever, and in all cases, to prefer their interest to his own.
> But his unbiased opinion, his mature judgment, his enlightened conscience, he ought not to sacrifice to you, to any man, or to any set of men living. These he does not derive from your pleasure; no, nor from the law and the Constitution. They are a trust from Providence, for the abuse of which he is deeply answerable. Your Representative owes you, not his industry only, but his judgment; and he betrays, instead of serving you, if he sacrifices it to your opinion.

Mr. Chairman and Members of the committee, it is my solemn judgment, not matured by years of study of money, not tested in the crucible of high finance, but nevertheless my solemn judgment that this is the first step toward inflation.

I do not know where this policy will lead us, but coming from Missouri you must show me. I am against the bill. [Applause.]

They say that the present dollar is not a fit measure today by which to value services and goods; they would cut it 40 percent and thereby try to cure our financial troubles.

Why, gentlemen, in times of famine or in plenty you might as well change the bushel measure and attempt thereby to get rid of shortages or surpluses. You cannot by changing the measure thereby cure the trouble.

There are many reasons that prompt me to vote against this bill. Time does not permit me to go into them. I asked for time on this side and on that side of the aisle, but got none. I am against the bill because I believe it robs the living of 40 percent of their wealth. [Applause.]

This is the first time you placed a penalty on frugality. We have always been taught to save to acquire property, and now the Government is going to take 40 percent of it from us. [Applause.]

I am against this bill because it breaks faith with our honored dead. Every widow sustains a 40-percent cut in the return from her dead husband's life insurance.

I am against this bill because it crushes the activities of small colleges and like institutions operating on fixed investments.

I am against this bill because it is a pay cut of 40 percent to labor.

This is the first step in inflation. What will be the next?

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I rise to supplement what the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. McGUGIN] has so ably stated on behalf of himself and other members of the Coinage, Weights, and Measures Committee. I call the attention of the House again, because I have done this frequently in the past, to the fact that Federal Reserve notes are held outside of this country. They are contracts payable in gold. I also call the attention of this House again to the fact that gold certificates are held ouside of this country, and under the recent decision in Great Britain of the highest court they are contracts, and they involve the United States in a situation which is going to be troublesome to handle. In connection with that, referring to line 23, on page 8, in regard to letting gold out of this country, the bill provides that it can be done by the Federal Reserve banks for the purpose of settling international balances. I call attention to the fact that this does not say international trade balances. This refers to contracts which our bankers have made with foreign countries and foreigners who owe the United States and its people money.

It is a serious matter to give the authority to the Federal Reserve that you are giving them in this bill, because there are fraudulent contracts involved here which may seriously involve the people of the United States. Need I go further than to say in that respect that I am referring to German acceptance credits, which are well known to be held by member Federal Reserve banks and by Federal Reserve banks themselves? Are you going to permit a settlement in this manner with these credits which never should be recognized?

I also call attention to another thing that you are doing here today. You are by this act absolutely relieving the Federal Reserve System from its obligation to retire its own notes. The United States is taking upon itself today by this act the full obligation of retiring the Federal Reserve notes to the amount, January 17, 1934, of $3,211,089,970. Federal Reserve notes have been issued illegally. You are making good the gambling debts of the Federal Reserve banks. I cannot let this bill pass without again calling your attention to it, because I have repeatedly brought this to the attention of the House. I have introduced resolutions calling upon this House to find out about the dishonest transactions of the Federal Reserve. No attention has been paid to it. Are you going to permit, by this action, the covering up of these fraudulent transactions? That is the question that I want the majority, who have the responsibility, to answer. What are you going to do about my charges in the form of impeachment of the Federal Reserve and its officers?

The Clerk read as follows:

> SEC. 5. No gold shall hereafter be coined, and no gold coin shall hereafter be paid out or delivered by the United States: Provided, however, That coinage may continue to be executed by the mints of the United States for foreign countries in accordance with the act of January 29, 1874 (U.S.C., title 31, sec. 367). All gold coin of the United States shall be withdrawn from circulation, and, together with all other gold owned by the United States, shall be formed into bars of such weights and degrees of fineness as the Secretary of the Treasury may direct.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. When I used to raise about 100 litters of pigs a year I found that the longer I let the pigs nurse the sow the harder it was to wean them away from her, and I say to you that the longer you allow the Wall Street pirates to drain the lifeblood of the American people that much harder it is to take them away from that teat. Mention was made by the distinguished orator from Massachusetts about the American flag, which we honor, respect, and revere. I say to you that the money kings of Wall Street hauled that flag down and substituted the black flag of John Pirate Morgan and his buccaneers for it. We were told by a gentleman on the other side of the House, the minority floor leader, that this majority group is the most spineless and of the least ability that had ever sat in the House. As one of those spineless majority, I say that I have the courage to trample down and destroy your god of gold once and for all time.

I appeal to you gentlemen on my side of the House. When the Economy Act came up you told us to support the President of the United States. You say that you are apprehensive of turning over power and authority to one man. The people of this country last November turned over all the power and authority to the only man in the history of the country who has had the courage to tell Wall Street to go to hell and stay there, and he is the man that you have to support today, Franklin D. Roosevelt, President of the United States.

SEVERAL MEMBERS ON THE REPUBLICAN SIDE. Hooray!

Mr. TRUAX. My friends, you may "hooray" if you please. That is what they did in the French House of Deputies when Louis XVI told the people to eat grass, and that is what our people have been eating under your administration for the past 12 years. I say to you gentlemen on the minority side that the people of this country are never going back to your form of government. It will be Roosevelt or revolution. I say call it dictatorship if you will. You will take that or a worse one in this country. You ask the question, Where are we going? I cannot answer that, but I can tell you where we have gone under your rule. Your full dinner pail has been transformed into a back-alley garbage can. Able-bodied pauperism had become a hideous fact in this country of ours. On March 3 one half of the banks of this country were closed down, and the President closed the rest of them to keep the bankers from stealing all the depositors' money.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. DARROW. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I rise for the purpose of bringing to the attention of the House what seems to be a rather important phase of this legislation, in a telegram just received. I would like the privilege of reading to the House this telegram:

To Congressman's Secretary:

Please deliver to Member on floor. While strongly favoring gold nationalization and general objectives President's monetary policy, we believe pending bill harbors grave dangers, stripping Congress of its power to regulate value of money—a duty imposed upon it by the Constitution. Unlike legislation passed during emergency last spring, which was temporary, this bill seeks permanent transfer of the power of Congress over money to Treasury. We urge sufficient delay for full but prompt discussion.

COMMITTEE FOR THE NATION.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. Except to the extent permitted in regulations which may be issued hereunder by the Secretary of the Treasury with the approval of the President, no currency of the United States shall be redeemed in gold: Provided, however, That gold certificates owned by the Federal Reserve banks shall be redeemed at such times and in such amounts as, in the judgment of the Secretary of the Treasury, are necessary to maintain the equal purchasing power of every kind of currency of the United States: And provided further, That the reserve for United States notes and for Treasury notes of 1890, and the security for gold certificates (including the gold certificates held in the Treasury for credits payable therein) shall be maintained in gold bullion equal to the dollar amounts required by law, and the reserve for Federal Reserve notes shall be maintained in gold certificates, or in credits payable in gold certificates maintained with the Treasurer of the United States under section 16 of the Federal Reserve Act, as heretofore and by this act amended.

No redemptions in gold shall be made except in gold bullion bearing the stamp of a United States mint or assay office in an amount equivalent at the time of redemption to the currency surrendered for such purpose.

Mr. CHASE. I offer an amendment, Mr. Chairman.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CHASE: On page 5, line 17, after the word "notes", insert the following: "now outstanding or authorized, or which may be issued hereafter under the provisions of title III of Public, No. 10, Seventy-third Congress."

Mr. SOMERS of New York. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto do close in 10 minutes.

Mr. CHASE. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I have another amendment to offer.

Mr. SOMERS of New York. Can the gentleman not take them both up in 5 minutes?

Mr. CHASE. I can do that.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. CHASE. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is not unfriendly to the bill. It is not antagonistic to the philosophy of the bill. It is submitted in good faith, with the hope that the chairman of the committee will accept it.

Last spring we adopted the Thomas amendment, found now in title III of the Agricultural Adjustment Act.

I quote a few words only:

* * * The President is authorized—

To direct the Secretary of the Treasury to cause to be issued in such amount or amounts as he may from time to time order, United States notes, * * *

* * * but notes issued under this subsection shall be issued only for the purpose of meeting maturing Federal obligations to repay sums borrowed by the United States and for purchasing United States bonds and other interest-bearing obligations of the United States.

Right here is the point of the Thomas amendment, to permit the saving of money by retiring tax-exempt, interest-bearing United States bonds, with taxable, non-interest-bearing United States notes. October 15 and since there were and are callable $8,201,000,000 of first and fourth Liberty Loan bonds, bearing on the average 4¼-percent interest. If the administration will exercise the power granted by the Thomas amendment it will save more than $120,000,000 a year in interest on three billion of these bonds alone, and the only objection heard is that this is printing-press money, greenbacks, fiat money. A piece of currency with green ink on the back is called "fiat money." It costs the paper, the ink, the plates, and the cost of the engraving. Back of it is the faith and credit of the United States. You take the same "promise to pay", put yellow ink on the back, and it is a bond. It costs the paper, the ink, the plates, and the cost of the engraving. Back of it also is the faith and credit of the United States.

It is high time that we in this country think a little more about the forgotten man, the taxpayer of America. I urge no dangerous inflation, but bonds can be as fiat as notes. And it is time we stop piling up this mass of interest-bearing debt through unending issuance of tax-exempt bonds.

You gentlemen on that side and we on this side are united in our wish to right the terrible wrong done the service men of America on the 11th day of last March through the misnomer Federal Economy Act.

The President, in today's paper, is said to wish to liberalize the provisions of the orders existing as a result of that act, in order that greater justice may be done disabled soldiers and the widows and orphaned children of soldier dead. His proposal will cost some $21,000,000, according to the press.

The American Legion asks yet further liberalization, at a cost of from sixty to eighty million dollars more. With this $120,000,000 saved through retirement of these tax-exempt, interest-bearing bonds, the administration can liberalize the bill to provide this help for the veterans and also can take care of the most underpaid of the Federal employees without additional cost to the taxpayers.

I submit the amendment in the hope that the chairman of the committee will accept it.

Mr. SOMERS of New York. Mr. Chairman, I cannot accept that amendment at this time without having studied it a little more closely.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. CHASE].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CHASE. I offer a further amendment, which I have sent to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CHASE: On page 6, between lines 4 and 5, insert the following new paragraph:

"Effective as of January 1, 1934:

"(1) Section 22 (a) of the Revenue Act of 1932 is amended by inserting before the period at the end of the first sentence thereof a comma and the following: 'including obligations of the United States or its possessions, and of any State, Territory, or any political subdivision thereof, or the District of Columbia.'

"(2) Paragraph (4) of section 22 (b) of the Revenue Act of 1932 is amended to read as follows:

"'(4) Tax-free interest: Interest upon securities issued under the provisions of any act of Congress, or under the provisions of any amendment to any act of Congress, or under or by the authority of the United States, any State or States, and/or any political subdivision of a State. Every person owning any of such securities shall in the return required by this title submit a statement showing the number and amount of such securities owned by him and the income received therefrom, in such form and with such information as the Commissioner may require.'"

Mr. SOMERS of New York. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment. I believe it is not germane. It is a tax measure and this is a currency measure.

The amendment relates to taxation, whereas this is a currency bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Minnesota wish to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. CHASE. Mr. Chairman, in half a moment I can state my position on this point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. CHASE. This, with the change of one word, is the Clark amendment adopted in the Senate last spring when the Thomas amendment was under debate.

It merely provides through legislation the elimination of the tax-exempt feature of interest-bearing Government bonds.

Every man in this Chamber is opposed to this tax-exempt feature of Government securities. Two or three nights ago the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky declared that at every opportunity he would attack the tax-exempt feature of Government bonds. Here is his chance to attack it.

We are stabilizing the currency; we are stabilizing Government bonds; suppose we stabilize the poor old American taxpayer.

By next year we will have put on his shoulders the burden of $31,000,000,000 of debt; on that the further burden of paying every year $1,125,000,000 in interest.

And on top of that we place the third burden of paying the share of the costs of Government avoided by those very wealthy gentlemen who have their funds invested in tax-exempt Government securities.

Let us take part of this burden from the shoulders of the American taxpayers.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will confine himself to the point of order. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. CHASE. I realize that under the conditions prevailing the Chair will hold that the amendment is not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. Replying to the gentleman from Minnesota, the Chair will hold, under parliamentary law and precedents, that the amendment is not germane. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. In the event that the weight of the gold dollar shall at any time be reduced, the resulting increase in value of the gold held by the United States (including the gold held as security for gold certificates and as a reserve for any United States notes and for Treasury notes of 1890) shall be covered into the Treasury as a miscellaneous receipt; and, in the event that the weight of the gold dollar shall at any time be increased, the resulting decrease in value of the gold held as a reserve for any United States notes and for Treasury notes of 1890, and as security for gold certificates shall be compensated by transfers of gold bullion from the general fund, and there is hereby appropriated an amount sufficient to provide for such transfers and to cover the decrease in value of the gold in the general fund.

Mr. KNUTE HILL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I voted for William Jennings Bryan in 1900, and I am proud of that fact. I believe that within the next year or two his great dream will come true. I believed in him then because his heart was with the common people. I believe today we have as the leader of the Democratic Party a man whose head as well as whose heart is with the common people. I believe he in wisdom and sincerity is submitting these laws to us for enactment. His vision, his courage, his frankness is refreshing.

Several objections have been raised to the bill under consideration. Let me say here and now I am for the bill and shall vote for it. I want to meet two or three of these objections.

One objection that has been urged against the bill is that it will devalue the gold dollar. I submit that for the past 10 years or more the gold dollar has been overvalued. Need I tell you that the farmers have been paying three times as much in payment of their debts and interest as the debts cost when contracted? Let me read to you from page 3 of the committee report. They say:

The purpose of this bill is not to depreciate the dollar below the normal purchasing power that prevailed when these debts were contracted, but to merely restore the dollar from its enhanced and appreciated purchasing power to normalcy.

I do not think that anything more than justice would be done were it depreciated temporarily even below that point, because it has been overvalued for the last 10 years.

The second objection raised against this bill is that it provides a one-man rule. Let me say it is my belief that it is far more safe to have a benevolent dictatorship under a man like President Roosevelt than to submit, as we have in the past, to an unscrupulous oligarchy in the shape of the Federal Reserve System. [Applause.]

The Constitution of the United States states that "Congress shall have the power to coin money and regulate the value thereof." We have delegated this power for decades into the hands of the big bankers of this country. I am willing to trust this one man who by his every action has shown his friendship for the American people. I am more willing to trust him than to trust these men who by their acts have shown their friendliness toward the international bankers and to the countries of Europe.

Let us look at the record, as the late-lamented—politically speaking—Alfred Smith would say. What does the record show? The record shows that in 1921 the Federal Reserve System sent word throughout the United States to its member banks that they should call in the farmers' notes they held; and they called in these notes and refused to give the farmers further credit. The farmers have been deflated for the past 13 years.

It was said by the gentleman from New York that we are trying to soak the rich. My good friends, do you know what Will Rogers said when this slogan went abroad a year ago? He said, "Soak the rich! You have soaked the poor until they are drowned." The farmers have lost their farms and the laborers their homes. Is it not time to give them some relief?

The third objection is that it takes the profits from the bankers and gives it to the United States Government, an estimated amount of from three to four million dollars. Who is the Government? The American people compose the Government, and if profit is to accrue it should be theirs rather than the few private bankers. Bonds or certificates are to be issued to them in return for their gold. This will not in anywise be an injustice to them and will place control of the metallic base in the hands of the Federal Government, where it belongs.

It has been said here today that by this bill we would sterilize, chloroform, and bury this gold in the United States Treasury. Has it not been buried lo these many years in the vaults of the Federal Reserve System? And have not its officials issued 10 times its value in credit paper, on which the American people have been paying rent profits to these Shylocks? When the people brought this credit paper to the banks for redemption, of course they could not meet it, and hence the crash of March 1933.

Now the corpse of the true and stable financial system of our early days must be resurrected to serve and bless the American people.

It is said we cannot trust the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Morgenthau. I would rather trust him, who has shown himself in sympathy with the President and the common people, than to trust the "greatest Secretary since Hamilton", Mr. Mellon, the friend of international bankers, who held his office in violation of law and who for 12 long years was the virtual President for that time, Harding, Coolidge, and Hoover being mere puppets in his hands.

The Thomas amendment was enacted by a large majority in both the Senate and the House. We who supported that amendment hoped and expected the President would use that power. We are whole-heartedly back of him in his program of inflation to raise commodity prices. We joyfully welcome the dawn of the new day which shall place control of money and credit, the vital stream in our economic and politic body, in the hands of our Federal Government instead of the private bankers of this country.

We may be using an extraconstitutional method to bring back this constitutional intent, but the present emergency demands emergency measures and the overwhelming majority of the American people urge it.

Mr. SOMERS of New York. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto do now close.

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the right to object.

Mr. SOMERS of New York. Then, Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto do now close.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 9. Section 3699 of the Revised Statutes (U.S.C., title 31, sec. 733) is amended to read as follows:

"The Secretary of the Treasury may anticipate the payment of interest on the public debt, by a period not exceeding 1 year, from time to time, either with or without a rebate of interest upon the coupons, as to him may seem expedient; and he may sell gold in any amounts, at home or abroad, in such manner and at such rates and upon such terms and conditions as he may deem most advantageous to the public interest, and the proceeds of any gold so sold shall be covered into the general fund of the Treasury: Provided, however, That the Secretary of the Treasury may sell the gold which is required to be maintained as a reserve or as security for currency issued by the United States, only to the extent necessary to maintain such currency at a parity with the gold dollar."

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I came here in the hope I might do something to help put this bill over.

I am in favor of setting the price on gold where it rightfully belongs and taking that gold and the profit from the vicious Federal Reserve System. However, I am opposed to a one-man rule. While it was not legal, we had practically a one-man rule under Andrew Mellon, and we all know the results thereof. It was not legalized by Congress; it was a usurpation of power, if you please.

I have every confidence in President Roosevelt. I think he is one of the greatest men that ever sat in the White House and directed the destinies of this Nation; but may I ask, What is going to happen following President Roosevelt? This is the question. He may not be in the White House forever.

Through the provisions of this bill we are delegating a great power into one hand, the hand of the Secretary of the Treasury, a power which should be invested in a nonpartisan committee of five men.

Another thing we are doing is to put into the hands of one man the power to deal internationally with our Federal gold reserve, a power that never should be delegated by Congress to any one man.

We speak of the Federal Reserve System; we speak of devaluation. It was in 1920 that the Federal Reserve Board, appointed by Woodrow Wilson, then President of the United States, caused the deflation from which we have suffered ever since. That was the beginning of the depression through which we now are passing. The depression may continue unless we take the right action today.

I am for the devaluation of gold. I am for bringing gold into the hands of the United States Government. I believe the gold should be public property; but I also believe in democracy and in the Constitution; and the Constitution gives to Congress the sole right to coin money and regulate the value thereof.

I shall vote to recommit this bill with the hope that the committee will eliminate this feature spoken against by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN], and adopt his amendment; and I express the further hope that the committee will see fit to incorporate a provision putting this power into the hands of a committee of five men, giving it the semblance of democracy to which it is entitled.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHOEMAKER. I yield.

Mr. FOCHT. The gentleman referred to Andrew Mellon, a citizen of Pennsylvania. Is it not a fact that Andrew Mellon as Secretary of the Treasury reduced the Federal debt from $23,000,000,000 to $16,000,000,000, the figure at which it stood just before he retired?

Mr. SHOEMAKER. No; it is true the taxpayers of the United States reduced that debt; and if Andrew Mellon had paid the debts with taxes collected instead of paying them back to himself and others, the debts would have been still further reduced by the sum of several billion dollars that he stole with immunity. [Applause.]

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WHITE: On page 7, line 10, after the word "Treasury", insert the following——

Mr. SOMERS of New York (interrupting the reading of the amendment). Mr. Chairman, a point of order. This section has been passed.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment may be read.

The CHAIRMAN. A point of order has been made that the amendment is not in order because the section has been read and passed. The gentleman from Idaho asks unanimous consent that the amendment be read. Is there objection?

Mr. KENNEDY of New York. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. SEGER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I realize that the sentiment existing in the House at the present time will not permit of any amendment to the bill. The more I hear of the debate the more I am confused, and I do not think I am alone in that. If I vote for this bill, I am going to vote for it because it appears to be part of an administration monetary program in which they have gone so far that there is no turning back.

At the same time the revelations developed on the floor of this House this afternoon by my colleague from Kansas, a member of the committee reporting this measure, cannot be emphasized too much. Our people should know that the majority leadership have not been fair in their rush to pass the bill, and they may come to rue the day they decided to bar certain monetary experts from giving testimony at the hearings. The President, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the House leadership may know just what the bill is going to do, but so far they have not given this interesting story to us and the millions of Americans milling around in this fog of monetary debate. After all, are we not establishing bad precedents which may endure for all time?

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

SEC. 10. (a) For the purpose of stabilizing the exchange value of the dollar, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized, directly or through any agency or agencies that he may designate, to purchase, sell, discount, or negotiate, or to contract to purchase, sell, discount, or negotiate, at home or abroad, with or without endorsement or guaranty, drafts, checks, bills of exchange, acceptances, including bankers' acceptances, coin, bullion, cable transfers, foreign exchange, bonds, notes, evidences of indebtedness, including the obligations of the United States or of any foreign government, and any obligations or securities in whatever currency payable, to establish credits therefor and generally to exercise such powers as are incidental to the powers conferred by this section.

(b) To enable the Secretary of the Treasury to carry out the provisions of this section there is hereby appropriated, out of the receipts which are directed to be covered into the Treasury under section 7 hereof, the sum of $2,000,000,000, which sum when available shall be deposited with the Treasurer of the United States in a stabilization fund (hereinafter called the "fund") under the exclusive control of the Secretary of the Treasury, whose decisions shall be final and not be subject to review by any other officer of the United States. The fund shall be available for expenditure, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury and in his discretion, for any purpose in connection with carrying out the provisions of this section, including the investment and reinvestment in direct obligations of the United States of any portions of the fund which the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, may from time to time determine are not currently required for stabilizing the exchange value of the dollar. The proceeds of all sales and investments and all earnings and interest accruing under the operations of this section shall be paid into the fund and shall be available for the purposes of the fund.

(c) At such times as the President may determine, the President shall cause an audit to be made of the fund and a full report thereof shall be included in the next succeeding annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. SOMERS of New York. Mr. Chairman, I offer a committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment, on page 8, beginning with line 3: Strike out all down to and including line 16 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 10–A. For the purpose of stabilizing the exchange value of the dollar the Secretary of the Treasury, directly or through such agencies as he may designate, is authorized, for the account of the fund established in this section, to deal in gold and foreign exchange and such other instruments of credit and securities as he may deem necessary to carry out the purposes of this section. An annual audit of such fund shall be made and a report thereof submitted to the President and a general report of the operation of the fund shall be made by the President to the Congress within the period beginning 90 days before and ending 90 days after the expirational 3 years from the date of the enactment of this act."

Mr. SOMERS of New York. Mr. Chairman, this committee amendment simply explains a little more definitely the stabilization fund. This requires the Secretary of the Treasury to report once a year to the President and the President to report 3 years from the passage of the act to the Congress of the United States.

Mr. McFADDEN and Mr. McGUGIN rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Kansas rise?

Mr. McGUGIN. For the purpose of stating that this amendment offered by the chairman met the unanimous approval of the committee.

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SOMERS of New York. Yes.

Mr. McFADDEN. I should like to ask the gentleman whether this section does not give to the Secretary of the Treasury the right to accept foreign securities for war debts? Certainly the language of the bill permits it. Are you granting authority to reduce or cancel foreign debts?

Mr. SOMERS of New York. I do not believe it does.

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman state positively that it does or does not?

Mr. SOMERS of New York. I did not study that particular feature of the bill. I do not want to, at this moment, and in this confused state, give the gentleman any assurances one way or the other.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, here is another authority to the Secretary of the Treasury which gives the Secretary rights which this Congress has refused in prior enactment of legislation. Are you going to now nullify that provision in the moratorium resolution which said that there should be no reduction of the foreign debts?

Is this the reason the administration has been accepting tokens in small partial payments of the debts owing this country by Great Britain and thus granting extension on the terms of the debt settlements, contrary to the law passed by Congress on the Hoover moratorium bill in 1931?

I warn you the action you are taking today is a step toward reduction and cancelation of war debts due the United States and a step to aid the international banking group to settle in their favor the German acceptance credit under the Albert H. Wiggin stand-still agreement with German creditors.

Let me say to you that by this enactment you are cutting the foreign debt to the extent you devalue the dollar. If you devalue the dollar 40 cents, you have canceled 40 percent of the foreign debt owed the United States.

May I say further, supplementing what I have said previously, the authority for the Secretary of the Treasury and the Federal Reserve Board to deal with Federal Reserve debts is involved. I am referring to the short-term debts, acceptance credits in Germany, and so forth, with which Albert H. Wiggin and Gates W. McGarrah are dealing. You are dealing with something of vital importance because these gentlemen, representing the international financial group that stands to lose one billion and a half dollars are anxious to cancel 40 percent of this debt to protect themselves against losses.

Is this Congress going to blindly pass such legislation? Have we lost all sense of proportion? Are we going to sacrifice the rights which the people of this country have intrusted to this body, and pass this bill without proper consideration? I beg the leadership of the House to consider the question of returning this bill to the committee. There have been enough questions raised here this afternoon which justify the sending of this bill back to committee. I beg you to do this before you sacrifice on the altar the interests of the people of the United States.

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the committee amendment.

I am in accord with much that has been said by my colleague, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN], but the issue before the House at this particular time is whether or not we shall accept the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SOMERS]. If the House should refuse to accept the amendment, this would leave the bill in its present form giving the Secretary of the Treasury power to deal in drafts, checks, bills of exchange, including acceptances, coin, bullion, cable transfers, and almost everything one can think of.

The question is whether you are going to accept (a) as it is in the bill, or (a) as presented by the gentleman from New York. On this question the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York is infinitely better than (a) in the bill.

You cannot reach the question presented by my colleague from Pennsylvania by defeating this amendment. There is only one way you can reach that and that is for the Congress to have the courage and the patriotism to rise to its duty and retain its constitutional power over money instead of giving it to one man, the Secretary of the Treasury.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SOMERS of New York. Mr. Chairman, I offer a further committee amendment, which is more or less of a technical one.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 9, line 14, strike out, commencing with line 14, all down to and including line 17.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. McGUGIN: Page 9, line 4, that the comma after the word "section" in line 4 be stricken out and a period inserted in lieu thereof, and that the remainder of the sentence, beginning with the word "including" in line 5 and ending with the word "dollar" in line 10, be stricken out.

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, this amendment would strike out all of lines 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, and down to the word "dollar" in line 10.

Here is what these lines do as now in the bill: They give to the Secretary of the Treasury authority to take any part of this $2,000,000,000 fund, agreeable to the President, and use it to sustain the bond market for United States bonds.

Now, what is the situation? True, we are about to float $10,000,000,000 worth of bonds, but we should issue those bonds on the honest, true value of the credit of the United States. We should not take a smaller sum and use it to peg the market price of outstanding Government bonds, while the Government is going out and selling to the people of this country $10,000,000,000 worth of new bonds. If this country does that, then the Government is practicing the same tactics that Morgan practiced when he floated an issue of German bonds in this country and sustained the market until he had sold a great block of these bonds to innocent purchasers. I want my Government to retain its credit, but I want it to retain its credit honestly.

We passed a securities act demanding that stock and bond sellers be honest when they sell their securities, and I want the Government to be honest when it sells its securities.

I will tell you the manly and honorable way to maintain the credit of this country so our bonds will always be worth par. Let Congress have the courage to meet its constitutional duty of providing enough revenue to meet what it spends and not permit an unbalanced Budget for 4 years.

If these lines remain in this bill and Congress furnishes $2,000,000,000 to be used in regulating the United States bond market, then, in truth, Congress should be haled before the Pecora committee over in the Senate, because we shall be doing exactly the dishonest thing, the reprehensible thing, for which we have criticized Morgan, the Insulls, and the rest who have floated bond issues by using money to peg the market while they were selling their bonds to the people.

Whatever we do let us be honest with ourselves and honest with the country; and if we do that, we will retain the credit of this country. [Applause.]

Mr. SOMERS of New York. The committee declines to accept the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 10. (a) For the purpose of stabilizing the exchange value of the dollar, a board named the "Currency Equalization Board" is hereby established. Such board shall consist of the President, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Governor of the Federal Reserve Board, and two other members to be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate. The salary of each of the two members appointed by the President shall be $10,000 per annum. Hereafter in this act the Currency Equalization Board shall be designated as the "board." The board shall act for the fund established in this section, to deal in gold and foreign exchange and such other instruments of credit or security as the board may deem necessary to carry out the purposes of this section. An annual audit of such fund shall be made and a report thereof submitted to the President.

(b) To enable the board to carry out the provisions of this section, there is hereby appropriated, out of the receipts which are directed to be covered into the Treasury under section 7 hereof, the sum of $2,000,000,000, which sum when available shall be deposited with the Treasurer of the United States in a stabilization fund (hereinafter called the "fund") under the exclusive control of the board, whose decisions shall be final and not subject to review by any other officer of the United States. The fund shall be available for expenditure, under the direction of the board and in its discretion, for any purpose in connection with carrying out the provisions of this section, including the investment and reinvestment in direct obligations of the United States of any portions of the fund which the board may from time to time determine are not currently required for stabilizing the exchange value of the dollar. The proceeds of all sales and investments and all earnings and interest accruing under the operations of this section shall be paid into the fund and shall be available for the purposes of the fund.

(c) The board provided for in this act shall terminate on February 15, 1936, unless by law hereinafter enacted the life of such board shall be extended. Upon the termination of this board, a board shall continue to exist consisting of the President, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Governor of the Federal Reserve Board for the purpose of continuing as a liquidating agency for the orderly liquidation of such assets as are in the hands of the board on the date of the legal termination of the board created by this act. As such assets are liquidated, the proceeds from such assets shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the general fund.

(d) At such times as the President may determine, the President shall cause an audit to be made of the fund and a full report thereof shall be included in the next succeeding annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, this amendment follows verbatim section 10 of the bill insofar as the authority is concerned. There are only two changes involved in the amendment. The first change is that instead of this power being conferred on the Secretary of the Treasury it is conferred upon a board consisting of 5 members, 3 of whom by law are the President, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Governor of the Federal Reserve Board. The other two members are to be appointed by the President.

These two members are to receive $10,000 a year each. Of course, there is no additional salary for the three members of the board who are regular officials of the Government.

Whether or not it is wise to set up this $2,000,000,000 fund for this board I am not able to say, but the executive department insists that this emergency exists, and so there must be such a fund. I am willing to go along on that basis, but I cannot subscribe to the proposition of placing the power and responsibility upon the shoulders of any one man.

Now, whatever may be said, my amendment is not a partisan amendment. I have tried to be more than fair and wipe out all partisanship. I have not so much as asked that any of the members of the board be of the Republican Party. Under this amendment, the responsibility will rest upon the shoulders of five men, instead of upon the shoulders of one. The power under this act is so far-reaching, with two billions that can be used to run up and down the currency of other countries, that I say it is a dangerous policy.

It could well lead to war with other countries. What would you think if France had an equalization fund bearing down on our money? We might dislike it very much. England has a fund, but at least England has the excuse that she established her fund to uphold the value of her money, while we are setting up this fund not to uphold the value of our money but to drive the value of our money down. With such responsibility, surely it should not be upon 1 man but should be upon five men, as I suggest. Whatever may be said of my amendment, this much is true. It is good Jeffersonian Democracy, it is good Jacksonian Democracy, it is good Woodrow Wilson Democracy, and it is good Lincoln Republicanism. In fact, it is good ordinary traditional American constitutionalism. This country is dedicated to the proposition that it fears one-man rule, and I beg of you not to pass any legislation today which would leave in the power, not of Mr. Morgenthau but of any Secretary of the Treasury that may follow, full control over the money of this country. Garfield once said "He who has the control over the supply of money has control over all industry and commerce."

Such great power should not be placed in the hands of one man.

In addition, there is one other provision, and that is that this be temporary legislation. The date of expiration of this emergency power is February 15, 1936, and that gives 2 full years.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. DIES. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. I dislike very much to take up any time at this time, but this amendment is so important that I think we are justified in discussing it for a few moments.

I can appreciate the reason why the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. McGUGIN] wishes to create this board. He has fears that the Secretary of the Treasury having the administration of this tremendous fund might at some subsequent period or that some subsequent Secretary of the Treasury might in some way mishandle or misappropriate this fund. In answer to the gentleman, the Secretary of the Treasury at the present time has ample opportunity to misappropriate public funds, if he sees fit. The creation of this board is merely the creation of another commission, another bureau, another board that will not only take money to pay the salaries of the members of the board, but will involve delay in that before the board can be established and before this fund can go into operation the Senate will have to confirm the appointments of the President. The administration does not want this amendment. The administration, Mr. Chairman, is charged with the responsibility of administering this fund in the interest of all the people.

The Secretary of the Treasury is responsible to the President. The President is responsible to the people of the United States and to the Congress of the United States. If the Secretary of the Treasury should be guilty of any misappropriation, or if at any time in the future we should have a Secretary who did not properly handle these funds, the President can remove him, or, if the President cooperates with him or is guilty along with him, the President can be impeached or can be defeated by the American people.

Permit me to make this observation. It is absolutely necessary that this fund go into operation at the earliest possible moment. It is absolutely necessary that these transactions be veiled in secrecy. When the equalization fund was established in the House of Parliament, the members resisted the efforts to clothe its activities in secrecy. Finally Parliament, realizing it would be to the best interests of England to do so, gave to an unknown committee, responsible to the Ministry, this tremendous power to depreciate their own currency and appreciate foreign currency. At this point permit me to read briefly from some statements made. One of the prominent members of Parliament said on May 9, 1933, that "it was a lot of cant and hypocrisy to suggest that this money, a mere billion dollars additional to the fund, was wanted for any other purpose than to carry on this exchange work."

The gentleman said that what we want the funds for is simply to depreciate the American dollar. Mr. Chairman, that is not true. The purpose of this fund is to prevent foreign nations from appreciating our currency and depreciating their own, and giving to themselves and their own nationals superior trade advantages in the markets of the world.

Again, in conclusion, Mr. Chairman, the President is responsible to the people. I have abiding confidence in President Roosevelt. If the Congress wants to abolish this fund at any time, we have the power to do so, but at this serious juncture of affairs it does seem to me we would be justified in giving to the President and to the Secretary of the Treasury this power, and eliminate bureaus and boards.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. McGUGIN].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. McGUGIN) there were ayes 73 and noes 168.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 12. Paragraph (b) (2) of section 43, title III, of the act approved May 12, 1933 (Public, No. 10, 73d Cong.), is amended by adding two new sentences at the end thereof, reading as follows: "Nor shall the weight of the gold dollar be fixed in any event at more than 60 percent of its present weight. The powers of the President specified in this paragraph shall be deemed to be separate and distinct powers, and may be exercised by him, from time to time, severally or together, whenever and as the expressed objects of this section in his judgment may require."

Mr. SOMERS of New York. Mr. Chairman, I offer a committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 10, line 4, strike out the words "separate and distinct" and insert in lieu thereof "separate, distinct, and continuing."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. McGUGIN: Page 10, line 1, strike out the sentence "nor shall the weight of the gold dollar be fixed in any event at more than 60 percent of its present weight" and insert in lieu thereof "the weight of the gold dollar is hereby fixed at 66⅔ percent of its present weight."

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, today we are considering a bill which the people of the United States believe is going to stabilize the dollar. They want something stable. The people of this country are done with fear and apprehension as to what is going to be the value of the dollar. They think stabilization is in this bill. Stabilization is not in this bill. This section is before you. You can read plain English. All this section does is to provide that if the dollar is revalued, it shall be between 50 and 60 percent of its present gold weight. I am in favor of devaluing the gold dollar. I want the Congress to perform that function, which is its constitutional duty, and it is not the constitutional privilege of any other Government agency to perform that function.

This amendment stabilizes the dollar, reduces the gold content, and fixes it at 66⅔ percent of its present weight in gold.

All the witnesses who appeared before our committee said 60 was too low, with the exception of Mr. Vanderlip and Father Coughlin, who did not place any specific gold content for the dollar. Professor Kemmerer, in a most recent article, says 66⅔ percent is low enough. Mr. Warburg, a man who is close to the ear of this administration, told the committee night before last that 60 was too low. This figure is in line with the best advice we have been able to receive. If it turns out that 66⅔ percent is too high, it shall then be the obligation of Congress to reduce it. If it turns out that it is too low, it shall then be the obligation of Congress to increase it. Above all, let us here today send out to the American people that which is the truth. Let us not lead them to believe that by the passage of this bill the dollar has been stabilized, because it has not. If you will accept this amendment, you will say to the people of the United States, "Your dollar is worth two thirds of its normal value. It has been reduced one third, and there it has been fixed by Congress, the tribunal which, under the Constitution, should perform that duty." Not only is it our opportunity to do our constitutional duty when we accept this amendment but it is our opportunity to be fair with the people of this country and, when we pass this bill, let them know honestly that their money has been stabilized at some figure.

I thank you.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. McGUGIN].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. McGUGIN. I offer a further amendment, which is at the desk, Mr. Chairman.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. McGUGIN: Page 10, line 1, strike out the sentence "nor shall the weight of the gold dollar be fixed in any event at more than 60 percent of its present weight" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "the weight of the gold dollar is hereby fixed at 60 percent of its present weight."

Mr. SOMERS of New York. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto do close in 5 minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. McFADDEN. My point of order is, How can a Member of this House get an opportunity to offer an amendment or talk against an amendment when any such gag rule as this is being pursued?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. O Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The matter stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania does not constitute a point of order.

The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. McGUGIN] is recognized.

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, the amendment I have now offered fixes the value at 60 instead of 66⅔. Let me say to you Democratic gentlemen who are now very anxious to get away and want to rush this bill through, you are passing legislation which will control the American people for years, and you should not be so hasty in your conduct. You have ramrodded this bill through this House without having fair deliberation before the committee. Now you might, at least, while we are considering this important section, not be too speedy in your effort to stop debate and stop any reasonable consideration of it.

I have no further argument to make in particular with reference to this amendment except that it merely reduces the gold content of the dollar to 60 percent of present weight. Then after this I will offer another amendment, on which debate will be shut off, of course, which provides that when it is fixed the President shall have a range of between 50 and 66⅔.

I now yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN].

Mr. McFADDEN. I am quite in accord with what the gentleman is proposing, but I fear that it will not reach the point even though it is accepted. I want to call the attention of the gentleman and of the House to the fact that you do not get stabilization by lowering the gold content of the dollar. That has to be done by subsequent agreements, and what I want to suggest to those here who have the responsibility is that when stabilization does take place, or they get ready for it, the policy of actual devaluation and international stabilization must be deferred until such date as the Government of the United States will have had time to enter into bilateral agreements with, first, all the Republics of America; second, the self-governing dominions of the British Empire; third, the continental nations of Europe; and, fourth, Great Britain. All these debtor nations should be dealt with in the order I have indicated, else the United States will be placed in a very embarrassing position on the question of arranging the parity of the dollar with the pound and with the franc. I hope there will be an honest parity between the dollar and the pound sterling. Great Britain should no longer have the advantage she has had in the past. We should have no advantage. No country or its people should be permitted to make money out of the medium of settlement of trade balances between countries

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. McGUGIN: On page 10, line 1, strike out the figure "60" and insert in lieu thereof the figure "66⅔."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MOTT: Page 9, line 22, after the words "Sec. 12", strike out the whole of section 12 and insert in lieu thereof the following: "For the purpose of further stabilizing the currency, it is hereby declared to be the policy of the Congress to reduce the weight of the gold dollar by an amount approximately equal to the present depreciation of the value of the currency in relation to gold. The extent of said depreciation having been ascertained to be approximately 40 percent, the President is hereby authorized and directed by proclamation to fix the weight of the gold dollar in grains 0.9 fine at an amount not exceeding 60 percent nor less than 50 percent of the present weight of the gold dollar."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Oregon.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, my amendment——

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House, all debate on the section and amendments thereto has been closed.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the enacting clause.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman withdraw his amendment?

Mr. MOTT. I do not withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Oregon.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, I now move to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BULWINKLE. According to the rules of the House, a motion to strike out the enacting clause must be in writing, stating certain specific facts.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 13. All actions, regulations, rules, orders, and proclamations heretofore taken, promulgated, made, or issued by the President of the United States or the Secretary of the Treasury, under the act of March 9, 1933, or under section 43 or section 45 of title III of the Act of May 12, 1933, are hereby approved, ratified, and confirmed.

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. McGUGIN: After line 7, page 10, strike out all of section 13.

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, section 13 provides:

That all actions, regulations, rules, orders, and proclamations heretofore taken, promulgated, made, or issued by the President of the United States or the Secretary of the Treasury, under the act of March 9, 1933, or under section 43 or section 45 of title III of the act of May 12, 1933, are hereby approved, ratified, and confirmed.

This section simply means that every action, rule, regulation, or order promulgated or made by the President or the Secretary of the Treasury under authority given to them in the general banking act or under the Thomas amendment are hereby ratified and confirmed.

So far as the committee is concerned, the truth is that not a member of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures knows all the acts and regulations which we are about to confirm.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGUGIN. I yield.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. An official of the Treasury Department appeared before the committee last night and gave us a list of the actions and orders. They are right here.

Mr. McGUGIN. Let me have them.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Now, if there is any objection to voting for the amendment, I wish to hear it. I do not think the gentleman will have any objection.

Mr. McGUGIN. The statement from the Treasury Department which the gentleman presents shows on its face that they held out on us and did not give us all of these orders. The first paragraph states—and I read it for the benefit of the House:

The principal proclamations, Executive orders, and orders referred to in section 13 of the bill H.R. 6976 are as follows.

That is what they are, the principal ones only; that is the ones which some Treasury Department official regards as the principal ones. We are not being called upon only to ratify orders which someone might regard as the principal regulations and orders, but, rather, we are called upon to ratify all of them, whatever they may be.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. What additional orders does the gentleman want? Does he want every order given to a stenographer to write a letter, or things of that character?

Mr. McGUGIN. This is not complete. It says, "The principal orders." The Treasury has given the committee what it may think are the principal ones. The gentleman does not know what he is asked to ratify and confirm, nor does any other Member of this House. It is not right to pass legislation in this haphazard manner.

Mr. SOMERS of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGUGIN. In a minute.

Mr. SOMERS of New York. In fairness to the Treasury Department, I think it should be said that the chairman of the committee asked him for only the principal ones.

Mr. McGUGIN. Does the chairman of the committee say that he knows all the proclamations that have been issued?

Mr. SOMERS of New York. I think I know the principal ones; yes.

Mr. McGUGIN. Will the chairman of the committee expressly say that he knows what he is voting for when he votes for this section?

Mr. SOMERS of New York. Yes, that I do; yes.

Mr. McGUGIN. You, my Democratic friends, who now are so anxious to rush this bill through, will sit here and vote blindly to ratify something you know nothing about. You may do so if you wish; but if you do, it is a confession on the part of Congress of its own inability to legislate intelligently. In the next place, ratifying all these orders is an utterly useless thing to do. The last one of these orders was issued pursuant to legislation in which we gave the President or Secretary of the Treasury wide authority in these matters.

If they exceeded their authority, full ratification at this time would not better the situation any. If they issued orders contrary to the Constitution, such ratification as we might make at this time would serve no purpose. All in the world there is to this section is that it is an effort to force Congress to pass a resolution, so to speak, blindly approving whatever the President and Secretary of the Treasury have done.

I voted last spring to give power to the Executive to meet the then emergency, but now, when Congress is called upon to ratify regulations when Congress does not know what regulations have been made, I refuse to go along. I insist that such procedure is not in keeping with parliamentary government.

Mr. SOMERS of New York. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and amendments thereto do now close.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 10, line 13, insert the following:

"SEC. 14. (a) The Second Liberty Bond Act, as amended, is further amended as follows:

"(1) By adding at the end of section 1 (U.S.C., title 31, sec. 752; Supp. VII, title 31, sec. 752), a new paragraph as follows:

"'Notwithstanding the provisions of the foregoing paragraph, the Secretary of the Treasury may from time to time, when he deems it to be in the public interest, offer such bonds otherwise than as a popular loan and he may make allotments in full, or reject or reduce allotments upon any applications whether or not the offering was made as a popular loan.'

"(2) By inserting in section 8 (U.S.C., title 31, sec. 771), after the words 'certificates of indebtedness', a comma and the words 'Treasury bills.'

"(3) By striking out the figures '$7,500,000,000' where they appear in section 18 (U.S.C., title 31, sec. 753) and inserting in lieu thereof the figures '$10,000,000,000.'

"(4) By adding thereto two new sections, as follows:

"'SEC. 19. Notwithstanding any other provisions of law, any obligations authorized by this act may be issued for the purchase, redemption, or refunding, at or before maturity, of any outstanding bonds, notes, certificates of indebtedness, or Treasury bills, of the United States, or to obtain funds for such purchase, redemption, or refunding, under such rules, regulations, terms, and conditions as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe.

"'SEC. 20. The Secretary of the Treasury may issue any obligations authorized by this act and maturing not more than 1 year from the date of their issue on a discount basis and payable at maturity without interest. Any such obligations may also be offered for sale on a competitive basis under such regulations and upon such terms and conditions as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, and the decisions of the Secretary in respect of any issue shall be final.'

"(b) Section 6 of the Victory Liberty Loan Act (U.S.C., title 31, sec. 767; Supp. VII, title 31, secs. 767–767a) is amended by striking out the words 'for refunding purposes', together with the preceding comma, at the end of the first sentence of subsection (a).

"(c) The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to issue gold certificates in such form and in such denominations as he may determine, against any gold held by the Treasurer of the United States, except the gold fund held as a reserve for any United States notes and Treasury notes of 1890. The amount of gold certificates issued and outstanding shall at no time exceed the value, at the legal standard, of the gold so held against gold certificates."

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I rise for the purpose of asking a question of the chairman of the committee. Will the gentleman explain to us what this provision is?

Mr. SOMERS of New York. This provision contains a number of authorizations that give the Secretary of the Treasury a more flexible control over the currency and financial condition of the country. I will say to the gentleman that I examined these provisions rather carefully with some suspicion myself, and I came to the conclusion that they could not do definite harm. It would take too long to explain them all at this time, but I shall be glad to do so to the gentleman in private.

Mr. McFADDEN. Does the gentleman say that he cannot explain what this section means?

Mr. SOMERS of New York. Yes; I say it gives the Secretary of the Treasury a more flexible control of the financial situation.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment to the committee amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment to the committee amendment offered by Mr. BROWN of Kentucky: Page 11, line 15, after the word "prescribe", insert "and no obligation hereafter issued of the United States Government or the interest thereon shall be exempt from taxation."

Mr. SOMERS of New York. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment that it is not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. TERRELL of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Will the gentleman from New York [Mr. SOMERS] state whether or not this section on page 11 authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to issue $10,000,000,000 in bonds?

Mr. SOMERS of New York. It does.

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SHOEMAKER. I should like to find out from the chairman of the committee how in the world we shall know what we are voting on when the committee itself has offered a half dozen amendments here and the chairman himself has stated that he is confused and cannot answer questions? How can we vote intelligently on a bill of that kind?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman does not state a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. SOMERS of New York. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 14. As used in this act, the term "United States" means the Government of the United States; the term "the continental United States" means the States of the United States, the District of Columbia, and the Territory of Alaska; the term "currency of the United States" means currency which is legal tender in the United States, and includes United States notes, Treasury notes of 1890, gold certificates, silver certificates, Federal Reserve notes, and circulating notes of Federal Reserve banks and national banking associations; and the term "person" means any individual, partnership, association, or corporation, including the Federal Reserve Board, Federal Reserve banks, and Federal Reserve agents. Wherever reference is made in this act to equivalents of dollars, currency of the United States, and gold, $1 or $1 face amount of any currency of the United States equals such a number of grains of gold, 0.9 fine, as at the time referred to are contained in the standard unit of value, that is, so long as the President shall not have altered by proclamation the weight of the gold dollar under the authority of section 43, title III, of the act approved May 12, 1933, as heretofore and by this act amended, 25.3 grains of gold, 0.9 fine, and thereafter such a number of grains of gold, 0.9 fine, as the President shall have fixed under such authority.

The Clerk reported the following committee amendment:

Line 15, page 12, strike out "14" and insert in lieu thereof "15."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk reported a further committee amendment, as follows:

Page 13, line 3, strike out, beginning with the word "equivalents", through the word "and", in line 4, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "equivalents as between dollars or currency of the United States and."

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, as a matter of information, I should like to ask the chairman why the islands of Hawaii are left out.

Mr. SOMERS of New York. Why is that necessary? I did not think it was necessary.

Mr. McFADDEN. It is a part of the territory of the United States, and I do not see why it should be left out of this bill.

Mr. SOMERS of New York. I think it is understood to be included as territory of the United States.

Mr. McFADDEN. You put in the Territory of Alaska but leave out the Hawaiian Islands.

Mr. SOMERS of New York. Does the gentleman want to submit such an amendment?

Mr. McFADDEN. Yes; I would submit such an amendment.

Mr. SOMERS of New York. I think it would be better to take care of that in conference.

Mr. McFADDEN. Then there is one more question I should like to ask as a mattter of information.

In line 20 on page 12, the language "which is legal tender in the United States." I should like to have the gentleman inform us what is legal tender in the United States now or when this bill becomes law.

Mr. SOMERS of New York. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto do now close.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, my question was not a flippant one. It is a matter on which we should have knowledge—what is meant by the term "legal tender"?

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 15. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved. If any provisions of this act, or the application thereof to any person or circumstances, is held invalid, the remainder of the act, and the application of such provision to other persons or circumstances shall not be affected thereby.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 13, line 15, strike out "15" and insert in lieu thereof "16."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 16. All acts and parts of acts inconsistent with any of the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

With the following committee amendment:

In line 21, page 13, strike out "16" and insert in lieu thereof "17."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SOMERS of New York. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the committee amendment, which I have sent to the desk, which is largely a matter of punctuation, may be considered and agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendments: Page 3, line 22, after the word "earmarked" insert a colon; on page 4, line 6, after the word "to", insert a comma; page 6, line 22, after the quotation marks, insert "Sec. 3700"; on page 7, line 13, after the quotation marks, insert "Sec. 3699."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment previously offered by myself at page 7, line 10, may be printed in the RECORD at this point.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Idaho?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WHITE: Page 7, line 10, after the word "Treasury", insert the following: "That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to receive deposits of all silver bullion offered in quantities of not less than 100 ounces and to issue therefor silver certificates in denominations of $1,000, $100, $10, $5, and $1, at the market price of the silver deposited at noon on the day of deposit: Provided, That such market price of silver at the date offered is not in excess of 10 cents an ounce above the average market price of silver for the 3 preceding calendar months; nor at any time shall silver bullion be received or silver certificates issued at a value of more than $1.29 per ounce. The Director of the Mint shall continue to obtain and keep the necessary statistics to determine the price of silver for the purposes of this act, and shall publish the same at least every 30 days, and shall deliver such statement of prices to any person, firm, or corporation tendering silver for purchase by the United States Government under this act.

"SEC. 2. The silver bullion deposited under the provisions of this act shall be coined into standard silver dollars and subsidiary silver coins sufficient, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury, to meet any demands for redemption of silver certificates issued under the provisions of this act, and such coin shall be retained in the Treasury for the payment of such certificates on demand. Silver certificates or reissued silver certifiates issued under this act, when presented at the Treasury, shall be redeemed in standard silver dollars, or in subsidiary silver coin, at the option of the holder of the certificates.

"SEC. 3. Silver certificates issued under this act are hereby made legal tender and shall be accepted at their full face value for all debts and dues, public and private, within the United States, except where otherwise stipulated in the contract and shall be receivable for customs, taxes, and all public dues, and when accepted by the Government shall be reissued and in all respects become a part of the lawful money of the United States. Said silver certificates when held by any national banking association or Federal Reserve bank may be counted as part of its lawful reserve.

"SEC. 4. There shall be engraved on one side of each silver certificate so issued, 'This certifies that there is on deposit in the Treasury of the United States one silver dollar payable on demand' and, on the reverse side, 'This certificate is legal tender for all debts, both public and private.'

"SEC. 5. Whenever the amount of silver bullion so acquired and on deposit in the Treasury as aforesaid exceeds by 25 percent in value when valued in gold, the face value of all certificates issued against same, the Secretary of the Treasury is further authorized and directed to issue additional certificates against said silver bullion so acquired and deposited in the Treasury under this act in an amount equal to the excess value of the said silver bullion. The additional certificates so issued shall be put in circulation by discharging current obligations of the Government.

"SEC. 6. Silver bullion deposited under the provisions of this act shall be subject to the requirements of existing laws and the regulations of the mint service governing the method of determining the amounts of pure silver contained and the amount of the charge, if any, to be made, but such silver bullion shall not be counted as part of the silver bullion authorized or required to be purchased and coined under provisions of existing law."

Mr. BEEDY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I took the floor for a few moments when general debate on the bill was in progress and said that I should not vote for the bill because I had not had an opportunity, as one Member of this House, to be properly informed as to its provisions.

I made some protest against the fact that there had been no hearings, and that there were not available for the Members of the House printed hearings on this bill. I referred, as have many other Members, to the vast importance of this bill and its far-reaching provisions. I stated then, and I now repeat, that I do not think there are 10 Members in this House who can go back to their constituents and intelligently explain the provisions of the bill. Whereupon the gentleman from California took some exception and said he did not appreciate that kind of a compliment.

I now submit that in the face of what has transpired in this Committee this afternoon what I said was fully justified. Clearly there is no comprehensive understanding of the bill as frequently evidenced this afternoon. Inability to explain the bill by those having it in charge is a sufficient justification, I submit, for a refusal to support it.

I have some pride in the proceedings of this House. But this afternoon's performance is not calculated to swell that pride. A casual observer of these proceedings, involving as they do the consideration of an important legislative proposal, must have experienced conflicting emotions. If he can return to his home and say that he has confidence in representative government, he certainly must have an elastic conscience. [Laughter and applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the Committee will rise.

The Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BANKHEAD, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H.R. 6976) to protect the currency system of the United States, to provide for the better use of the monetary gold stock of the United States, and for other purposes, under House Resolution 227, directed him to report the same back to the House with amendments adopted by the Committee.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered. Is there a demand for a separate vote on any amendment?

There was no demand for a separate vote, and the amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. McGUGIN. I am.

The Clerk read as follows:

Motion to recommit by Mr. McGUGIN: Mr. Speaker, I move that the bill under consideration be recommitted to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures with instructions that it be amended as hereinafter set forth, and, after being so amended, that the committee report the bill back to the House forthwith. The amendment is that section 10 as amended be amended and changed to read as follows:

"SEC. 10. (a) For the purpose of stabilizing the exchange value of the dollar a board named the Currency Equalization Board is hereby established. Such board shall consist of the President, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Governor of the Federal Reserve Board, and two other members, to be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate. The salary of each of the two members appointed by the President shall be $10,000 per annum. Hereafter in this act the currency equalization board shall be designated as the 'board.' The board shall act for the fund established in this section, to deal in gold and foreign exchange and such other instruments of credit or security as the board may deem necessary to carry out the purposes of this section. An annual audit of such fund shall be made and a report thereof submitted to the President.

"(b) To enable the board to carry out the provisions of this section, there is hereby appropriated, out of the receipts which are directed to be covered into the Treasury under section 7 hereof, the sum of $2,000,000,000, which sum when available shall be deposited with the Treasurer of the United States in a 'stabilization fund' (hereinafter called the 'fund') under the exclusive control of the board, whose decisions shall be final and not subject to review by any other officer of the United States. The fund shall be available for expenditure, under the direction of the board and in its discretion, for any purpose in connection with carrying out the provisions of this section, including the investment and reinvestment in direct obligations of the United States of any portions of the fund which the board may from time to time determine are not currently required for stabilizing the exchange value of the dollar. The proceeds of all sales and investments and all earnings and interest accruing under the operations of this section shall be paid into the fund and shall be available for the purposes of the fund.

"(c) The board provided for in this act shall terminate on February 15, 1936, unless by law hereinafter enacted the life of such board shall be extended. Upon the termination of this board a board shall continue to exist consisting of the President, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Governor of the Federal Reserve Board for the purpose of continuing as a liquidating agency for the orderly liquidation of such assets as are in the hands of the board on the date of the legal termination of the board created by this act. As such assets are liquidated, the proceeds from such assets shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the general fund."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recommit.

Mr. McGUGIN. On that, Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The question of ordering the yeas and nays was taken.

The SPEAKER. Forty-nine Members have arisen—not a sufficient number. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The motion to recommit was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Several Members demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 360, nays 40, not voting 32, as follows:

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call my name.

The Clerk called the name of Mr. RAINEY, and he answered "yea."

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Speaker, I have been advised that my colleague, Mr. BRITTEN, who is sick in the hospital, would have voted "yea" had he been present.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Mr. Speaker, my colleagues from Pennsylvania, Mr. BROOKS, Mr. SNYDER, Mr. FREY, and Mr. HAINES, unavoidably absent, had they been present would have voted "yea."

Mr. CULLEN. Mr. Speaker, my colleague from New York, Mr. CARLEY, is absent on account of illness. If present, he would have voted "yea."

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, my colleague from Oklahoma, Mr. JOHNSON, is absent because of the death of his mother. If he had been present, he would have voted "yea."

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. MONTAGUE, is unavoidably absent. He has authorized me to say that if he were present he would have voted "yea."

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I have two telegrams here, addressed to me, dated today, which I desire to read. One is from Selfridge Field, Mich., and says:

Here official inspection. If present, would vote for rule and bill to control gold and stabilize prices.

J. J. MCSWAIN.

The other is from Connellsville, Pa., and is as follows:

In my district attending educational meeting. If vote is cast on money bill today, vote me "yes" with committee.

J. BUELL SNYDER.

Mr. SEGER. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. CAVICCHIA, is absent. If he were here, he would have voted "yea."

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. DOUGLASS, is absent on account of serious illness. If present, he would have voted "yea."

Mr. CANNON of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I was here all afternoon, but was called to the long-distance telephone just a few moments ago. If I had been present in the Chamber, I would have voted "yea."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

GENERAL LEAVE TO PRINT

Mr. SOMERS of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to extend their own remarks upon the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOLTON. Mr. Speaker, we are considering this bill today in much the same manner as we have other important legislation that has been presented to this body at this session, under a rule allowing a limited period for debate and permitting all too short an opportunity for changes on a subject of such momentous proportions to the Nation. We are acting without the benefit of proper consideration by the committee in charge of the measure, even though additional time for this purpose was requested by the chairman of that committee and denied.

The question of the stabilization of our dollar on a gold basis is not only most important but timely, as without some definite decision industry and recovery in general are greatly handicapped. The subject should be seriously considered and weighed. The thoughts of various individuals and groups should be studied, and the suggestion of the author of the bill and his associates should not be accepted as correct without proper analysis. Thorough study and consideration have been denied, and in the brief time allowed we are asked to accept or reject a measure on which full study and discussion have been impossible.

In other words, the Members of the House are forced under pressure to pass upon a measure which was placed before them within the past few days without opportunity for hearing the views of those most familiar and expert on this subject, without a report of the short hearings held on the bill by the committee and without sufficient time to study thoroughly the measure.

Whether the stabilization under the suggested ranges or at a definite figure is correct or whether the powers granted the President on this subject at the last session of Congress make the proposed legislation unnecessary cannot be decided in the short time we have. Action in this manner is largely a matter of course and is not worthy of any great legislative body.

The fact that the President has already declared that he has the authority to take over the gold held by the Federal Reserve banks and the fact that Congress at the last session delegated the power to devaluate the dollar to 50 percent if believed necessary cause many to wonder why legislation is asked granting these powers at this time. If, as has been stated, the President is anxious to have the approval of Congress, then proper consideration and study should be given and the reason for such haste made known.

Aside from the important question of adopting stabilizing features as outlined in the bill, the authority given the Secretary of the Treasury under section 10 (b) of the proposed act, namely, the placing of the huge stabilization fund of $2,000,000,000 under his exclusive control with power which makes his decision final and not subject to review by any other officer of the United States, is entirely unwarranted and contrary to our concepts of government. The fact that the Secretary of the Treasury is the representative in the Treasury Department of the head of our Government and receives his appointment on a strictly partisan basis offers possibility of political influence and partisanship, a feature so much to be avoided in a matter of this character. Far better would it be to call for the creation of a board, similar to the example of Great Britain, a nonpartisan board appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, whose powers and action would then be the result of combined thought—not what may prove to be an arbitrary decision on the part of one individual, and would prevent the tremendous and far-reaching authority in the hands of one man.

Unfortunately this measure is permanent and not temporary, which only emphasizes the need for care and ample consideration before action is taken by the House. We are binding not only ourselves but future generations to a policy which no one can be sure will bring the results desired.

One who endeavors to discharge his duty as prescribed by his constitutional oath of office as Representative of a large congressional district cannot do so when forced to take action in this hasty manner on legislation of such importance and so far-reaching in its effects.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, through the years there has been more or less mystery about the money question. The great majority of the people say bluntly and frankly that they know nothing about it. The financial and money experts claim to know all about it, and yet there are almost as many different theories as there are experts. Many of those who have given the problem long and serious consideration arrive at opposite conclusions. Each asserts with definite finality that he is right and that his analysis cannot be questioned.

In the midst of all these conflicting contentions and surrounded by the intricate network of our modern financial and business activities, it is little wonder that the average, everyday man on the street is confused and bewildered. There are some things about the money problem that may be regarded as plain and simple. But when it comes to considering it in its various ramifications as affecting credit, controlling the general commodity price level, its use as a standard measure of value, and in its use in the carrying on and settlement of international trade transactions, it becomes an involved and a difficult matter. There are just two kinds of real money, metallic and paper; coin and currency. Then there is what has been called credit money. Bank checks, bills of exchange, acceptances, and other kinds of trade paper belong to this class. It may be fairly said that 90 percent of the Nation's business is carried on by means of credit money. For that reason a legitimate demand for, and a liberal and reasonable extension of, credit to meet the demand must ever play a most important part in the trade operations of the country.

Money is the unit by which value is measured, just as the foot or the yard is the measure of size or distance, and just as the pound is the unit by which weight is determined. A building is so many feet long, wide, and high, and has a value of so many dollars. A bale of cotton weighs so many pounds and is worth so many dollars. The difference is the yardstick and the pound as units of measure are constant. They do not change. They are the same today that they were 50 years ago and will be the same 50 years hence. The dollar is variable; it has been constantly changing. It will purchase twice as much of the necessities of life at one time as it will another. It was over one and one half times more valuable in 1932 than it was in 1926. What would we think of a yardstick that 1 year was 36 inches and the next year was 54 inches in length? The main purpose of this bill is to make the value of the dollar constant, so that its purchasing power will not change from time to time.

In addition to being a measure of value, money is the medium of exchange. It is the vehicle upon and through which property is transferred from one individual to another. The nations of the world have adopted gold or silver or both as basic money. These metals have been used not only as coin to circulate as money but as a basis upon which paper money of varying amounts and kind has been issued. It has been thought necessary, in order to have sound money, that there be a metallic reserve, gold or silver or both, back of it. A sound currency is the basis for safe, reasonable, and legitimate credit. By legitimate credit, I mean the credit necessary to meet the trade activity of the community and for investment in self-liquidating projects and not credit to be wasted and squandered in speculative and gambling activities. It therefore seems necessary to have a valuable metallic reserve upon which to issue sound currency and upon which to establish legitimate credit. It is not in the mind of anyone in authority in this country to have anything but a sound dollar. There has been a great deal of meaningless talk about uncontrolled inflation, fiat, and printing-press money; talk calculated to increase uncertainty and incite additional fear and apprehension. The integrity of our dollar and the soundness of our monetary system will be maintained.

The Gold Reserve Act of 1934, which seeks to protect our currency system and provide for the better use of the monetary gold stock of the United States is now before Congress and I am glad to give it my unqualified and enthusiastic support. This bill has three main objectives:

First. To transfer the title to all gold now in the Federal Reserve banks to the United States Treasury.

Second. To authorize the reduction of the gold content of the dollar to from 50 to 60 percent of its present weight.

Third. To establish a stabilization fund of $2,000,000,000.

If gold is to be the basis for the issue of currency by the Government, then the Treasury of the United States should have the gold reserve. I am not one of those who thinks the basis must be gold alone. If necessary to broaden the base in order to have a stable foundation for an increased issue of currency, I see no reason why silver may not be added under certain limitations and restrictions. As long as gold alone is the basis, then the gold should be in the Treasury.

There has been a very determined effort by this administration to bring all the hoarded gold from hiding and place it in the Treasury. Every individual holder of gold is required to surrender it under severe penalty of law. Some are being prosecuted for trying to retain possession of their gold. If the individual must give up what gold he has, why should the Federal Reserve banks, that hold most of the gold stock of the country, be permitted to keep it? The cry of unconstitutionality is raised. It is "any port in a storm" for those who have enjoyed special privileges and now see those privileges slipping away from them. The Attorney General of the United States has confidently expressed the opinion that the act is constitutional and that conviction is shared by the legal fraternity generally. The wail of confiscation is heard. The plea of the old reactionary group, the representatives of the favored few, is that the gold belongs to the banks and that it is confiscation to take it away from them. Every dollar in gold that is taken from the banks will be paid for by the Government with lawful money of the United States, just as the gold is paid for that is taken from the individuals of the country, and just as any private property that is taken for public use is paid for.

The big banks of the country seem to think they have inherent rights and privileges not enjoyed by others. If they have enjoyed these special favors in the past, the time has come when this practice should end. It is unthinkable for anyone to advocate that the Federal Reserve banks should be allowed to retain the gold which they now have, and, when the weight of the gold in the dollar is reduced, permit the banks to enjoy a profit of some $3,000,000,000 on account of that reduction. If the amount of gold to make a dollar is reduced to 50 percent of its present weight, then the amount of the gold held in the Federal Reserve banks would be doubled in value and they would receive this enormous profit. There is now 23.22 grains of gold in each dollar. If this is reduced to 11.61 grains, or 50 percent of the present amount, then 23.22 grains of gold would represent $2 instead of $1, as at the present time. It is inconceivable that the banks should have the profits resulting from the devaluation of the gold dollar rather than the people themselves. The objection to the transfer of this gold from the banks to the Treasury is the last echo from the call of a bygone day. It is the last stand of the shock troops of the old decadent and discarded financial regime. This act takes the gold from the banks and gives it to the people themselves, where it belongs.

Public and private debts have increased at an enormous rate during the last 15 years. These debts were contracted at a time when wages were remunerative, when incomes were large, when commodity prices were high, when the dollar was cheap, measured by the purchasing power of the public and commodity prices. These debts reached the point in 1932 when they were almost if not quite equal to our entire national wealth. The farmer who contracted debts on the basis of $2 wheat and 10-cent hogs could not pay those debts with 25-cent wheat and 3-cent hogs. The laborer who contracted debts when he had regular employment at $4 or $5 a day could not pay those debts when he found himself without employment or only employed on part time at reduced pay.

In this situation there is only one of two ways out. The debtor cannot pay his obligations with a dollar that has doubled in value. The farmer cannot give 4 bushels of wheat in payment of a debt that 1 bushel paid at the time the debt was contracted. The laborer cannot give 2 or 3 days of work even if he had them, to pay a debt that 1 day's work paid for at the time it was contracted. So the debtor classes must either go into bankruptcy and lose all they have been able to save, or there must be an increase in the purchasing power of commodities and service, measured in terms of the dollar, and thereby give the debtor a chance to pay out. Bankruptcy means the foreclosure of all the mortgages and the transfer of property from the present owner to others. It means the loss of home, of farm, of shop, of store, and factory. It means destitution and want and, above all, it means despondency and despair; no chance, no hope for the future. To avoid this utter ruin, the purpose of this bill is to give authority to devalue the gold content of the dollar and thereby raise the purchasing power of labor and increase commodity prices. It is the hope that by reducing the weight of gold in the dollar that the price of commodities will increase. As gold becomes more valuable, the more it will purchase and the lower prices go. The value of the gold in the dollar is decreased by reducing the weight, and the amount it will purchase is decreased to that extent, and prices will therefore rise. When a normal price level is reached then it is proposed to stabilize the dollar at that level. It cannot be expected that the passage of this measure will result in the immediate restoration of normal conditions, but it is my belief that it is a step in the right direction and that it will finally lead to the restoration of commodity prices to a fair and reasonable level.

There is no cause for alarm at the introduction of this policy. This Government is only doing what almost every other nation has done. Other nations have devalued their standard unit of value in order to meet their urgent economic needs. They have done this to protect their debtor class and to save them from disaster and ruin, and it has been a success. Why should we not do the same?

The greatest defect in our economic and financial policy has been the uncertainty of commodity prices and the varying purchasing power of the dollar. The purpose of this bill is to raise the commodity price level and then stabilize the purchasing power of the dollar. As far as possible, make the purchasing power of the dollar the same from generation to generation. If this can be done, and I think it can, there will be accomplished one of the greatest economic and financial reforms in history and a long step will be taken to prevent the too oft-recurring vicious cycles of depression with their attendant destitution, suffering, and want.

A stabilization fund of $2,000,000,000 is established by this measure. This fund is obtained by reason of the resulting increase in value of the gold when the weight of the gold dollar is reduced. It is estimated that much more than $2,000,000,000 in gold will be brought into the Treasury under the provisions of this bill. Then when the weight of the gold dollar is reduced to 50 or 60 percent of its present weight, the profits accruing to the Government will be far in excess of the $2,000,000,000 provided for this stabilization fund.

The profits accruing from the transaction to the extent of $2,000,000,000 will make up the fund. While this is a new policy with us, it is not new among other nations. For some time England has been using a large stabilization fund to depreciate her pound sterling in order to gain trade advantages. The administration of this fund is placed in the hands of the Treasury Department. The manner in which the fund will be used is entirely in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, and the policy necessarily cannot be announced to the world. It is the intention that the fund shall be so used as to stabilize the American dollar in international exchange and protect our commerce from the assaults of like funds in the hands of other nations.

This is the most important piece of financial legislation submitted for consideration in recent times. It is only one of a series of proposals to bring relief to a distressed people. We have made rapid strides since March 4 of last year. The prompt enactment of this measure into legislation will add another achievement to the already long list of accomplishments to the credit of this administration and will mark another milestone on the road to recovery and prosperity.

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Speaker, we have before us now H.R. 6976, which is a bill to protect the currency system of the United States, to provide for the better use of the monetary gold stock of the United States, and for other purposes.

This is possibly the most important subject that has ever come before the Congress of the United States. There is nothing so vital as to have a currency properly balanced. The United States Government has been suffering for a number of years on account of the single gold standard. I have said in a number of addresses in my district for the last 3 or 4 years that we are being crucified on the cross of gold at the altar of shame. No truer statement could be made.

The single gold standard has proven a failure in practically every nation, only one prominent nation now being on the single standard, and that is France, and yet France is using today more silver money than they ever used before in the history of their country, claiming all the time to be on a single standard of money.

I am a believer in and advocate of that which is provided for in the Constitution for a double standard of money, and the standard to be owned and controlled exclusively by the United States Government. Gold has always been a coward, and could easily hide away and was easily cornered. This giving an opportunity for the panic to be brought on, as it was, and that could not be checked under a single standard of money. If we had had a double standard of money, it could not have been continued and could have easily been corrected. The trouble has been that gold has been so high that it took three or four times as much in agricultural products to get a dollar as should have been required. A well-balanced currency is a currency where commodities on the one side is an equal balance with the currency on the other side. If money goes high, then the scale of prices goes down and they should be held in equal balance.

By reducing the gold content in the dollar as provided for in this bill will be materially helpful to the improvement of our conditions in this country. The profit to the United States Government in this one act alone will be $4,200,000,000.

This bill provides that all the gold bullion now owned by the Federal Reserve or by any individual shall be melted into bars and placed in the Treasury and owned by the United States Government in order that it may have control at all times over the money of the country. At the time this bill is now being considered, about three and a half billions of the gold of the United States is in the hands of the Federal Reserve banks and not in the hands of the United States Treasury.

There is no reason why any contract that has ever been made by the United States Government should be required to be paid in gold. The requirements should be in the legal tender of the United States Government, and will from now on.

Those now holding gold did not pay gold for it but acquired it in the usual way of handling money. Gold coined money has not circulated for a number of years. The changes of the money basis which is provided for by the Constitution of the United States which says that Congress has the power to coin money and regulate the value thereof will allow the United States Government even under its existing law to more than double its circulation. Not only that, but it will also give us a trade relation with other nations that we have not had heretofore.

Just within the last few months 32 nations of the world have gone off the gold standard. There are only about eleven billion dollars of gold in the world, the United States owning around five billion of that, and France four billion, leaving two billion for the balance of the world. Everyone knows that France and the United States have very little trade relations with each other now, and the two nations owning nine elevenths of the gold of the world leaves practically nothing as a basis for the balance of the currency of the world.

The Congress of the United States authorized the President to use a double standard of money, both gold and silver, based on the principle in this bill. The President has now determined to have the coinage of silver recently mined in this country. That is only a step in the right direction, but should be followed up with a bill providing for the use of silver and on the same plan outlined in this bill for gold.

It is my opinion that if we ever have a world trade, we must have this legislation, then we can trade with any nation on the face of the earth, using either gold or silver. If we would buy the silver bullion of other nations and let them have our money issued on the silver stored in our Treasury as the gold is to be stored, and leaving that in this country as a trade balance for them, we could then have a world trade.

Gold and silver are not in large enough quantities in the earth to ever produce at any one time more money than will be needed for the countries of the world. An increasing business increases demand for money. The trouble with the United States in the last year or two is that we have had less money per capita in circulation than we ever had in the history of our lives. The truth is, we have not had enough in circulation to make change much less carry on business.

The policy of the Hoover administration of pouring in wealth at the top instead of giving some aid at the bottom and lifting up the men who really needed help, has been a ruinous policy in this country. I am glad we now have a President and an administration who are truly sympathetic to agriculture and are seeking to give every man an equal chance in life to earn a livelihood of his own. Conditions are fast improving, as everyone knows, and it is to be hoped with the remedies being used by the President and by Congress that we shall have a restored prosperity which will be permanent.

We hope the time will soon come when we may have our trade relations with India, China, and the other silver-using countries that are now being forced, on account of the cheapness of their money in this country under the gold standard, to raise a short-lint cotton that has been the cause of creating a surplus of cotton in our country. It is my opinion that the settling of the money question will largely settle that question. They will buy our cotton and quit raising the short lint.

The growing of short-lint cotton is not profitable to them and they are growing it only because they are being forced to on account of our standard of money. India also is growing four million and a half bales of short-lint cotton now, and if they should quit raising it for 2 years it would take up our entire surplus in this country. I hope the time will soon come when we shall not be crying to decrease acreage but that we have a world market for what we produce that is exportable and that we can use every acre of ground which is suitable for cultivation and produce food and clothing for the world. They need it and should have it. It has been my contention for years that it is not so much the question of overproduction as it is the question of underconsumption. If those who are hungry were properly fed, and those in need of clothing were properly clothed, we would not have a surplus of either.

There is one evil growing up in our country that we must soon meet or else we are doomed to land on the rocks. That is the question of issuing nontaxable interest-bearing bonds to the extent that we are now doing.

The United States Government now is paying $740,000,000 a year for interest on the bonded indebtedness of this country, and that is increasing rapidly. The interest alone that we are paying takes near a fourth of the revenue that is to be derived by the United States under its present law. Why should a condition of this kind exist? I do not believe that anyone can intelligently answer. It is my opinion that we should begin at a very early date to formulate a plan of retiring our interest-bearing bonds that have been issued by the Government and settle this issue once and for all.

Mr. FORD. Mr. Speaker, put in the plainest terms, the question before us today is this: Are we going to continue to ask the farmer to sell a dollar's worth of wheat or corn or hogs or cotton for 50 or 60 cents, or are we going to have the courage and good sense to put a stop to this? We can stop it, I believe, by reducing the gold content of the dollar and that is what devaluation means and what this bill provides.

We hope to make a dollar's worth of wheat bring a dollar, and not 50 or 60 cents. Yes; a dollar in currency—a Federal Reserve note, a national-bank note, or any other dollar. The farmer does not care, so long as it is a dollar.

What is a dollar's worth of wheat? One answer is the amount of wheat which a good farmer can produce and sell for a dollar at a profit. Another answer is that a dollar's worth of wheat is about the same quantity as sold for a dollar in normal years, such as 1926.

I think the 1926 dollar was an honest dollar. It enabled the farmer and the business man to carry on; it provided employment at decent wages for our workers; it enabled the debtor to pay his debts; and it provided reasonable income from such honest securities as were afloat. And I think the 1933 dollar was a dishonest dollar; because it was a dollar that cheated the farmer, slowed down business, threw millions out of work, bankrupted the home owner, and made it impossible for the debtor to pay his debts and for creditors to collect what was due them. It cut what in normal times were sound assets in two or utterly destroyed them; it impoverished honest and frugal people who saw their investments depreciate or become worthless. In fact, it all but ruined this wealthy Nation. And our friends the enemy call this an honest dollar and want it kept just as it is.

The opponents of this bill talk about repudiation of debts. What this bill is going to do is to prevent repudiation. All economists agree that debts contracted under a high price level cannot be paid under one drastically lower. There are two ways of avoiding universal bankruptcy. One is to scale down all debts, which to me is genuine repudiation, and the other way is to restore the prices to the level under which the debts were contracted.

The second is the honest method, and it is the one we are going to follow. To call restoration of the 1926 price level dishonest is absurd. Much of the opposition is due to an outworn and unfounded reverence for gold. Gold does not possess any inherent rights as money. Its importance is due to its price being fixed by law. Why we should consider it an economic sin to change its value in dollars by changing the gold content of the dollar is inexplicable.

The prejudice is perhaps due to a confusion between the price and the purchasing power of gold. The price has for years been fixed in the United States at $20.67; the gold content of the dollar has for years been fixed at 23.22 grains. But the purchasing power of gold has fluctuated with the years and under the influence of various forces. This fluctuation has brought hardship and suffering and ruin to millions of people. It is about time we decided to control gold in the interest of honesty and in the public welfare.

Instead of permitting gold to continue to be the one stable commodity in regard to price, because fixed by law, and the most unstable in relation to purchasing power, let us stabilize its purchasing power by reducing the gold content of the dollar and giving the President the power to change that content within a limited range, with the purpose of restoring economic opportunity to our people.

This talk against giving control to the Secretary of the Treasury, as I see it, indicates mere partisan opposition or a conservatism that fails to realize that the present crisis demands concentration of power in order to achieve quick action before the people perish.

In returning to the 1926 price and wage level, which is what we hope to bring about, it is argued that people with fixed incomes are going to suffer. The answer is, I think, that in the first place most of the so-called "fixed" incomes have been reduced or wiped out and that the only hope of restoring them is through this and other constructive measures now being put through. Moreover, most of the "fixed" incomes were established under the 1926 price level, which is about the average prevailing between 1921 and 1929. Is it unjust to restore the price level under which those incomes were established? No.

In closing, let me remind you that the price level of our staple commodities that enter foreign trade have been left to the control of France and England, while we have supinely stood aside unwilling to make necessary changes. Thank God for a President who understands the new currents and the new conditions in the world and who has the courage and energy to take drastic action in a crisis.

Mr. ANDREWS of New York. Mr. Speaker, the bill in which the President's monetary policy is embodied has, it seems to me, radical defects which ought to be cured before it is passed by the Congress. The people, like a majority of the Congress, have not understood the exact situation. This bill does not devalue the gold ounce. It confers upon the President no more power to devaluate than that which he already has by virtue of the Thomas amendment passed last spring, better known as "the inflation amendment." I supported that amendment and believe today in a fixed devaluation of the gold ounce. What we need is stabilization. The sooner the President is able to stabilize, the better off we will be.

This bill inaugurates a new and permanent system of currency management.

The task of setting up a new financial system is comparable with the setting up of the judicial system. To see that justice is done, that the decisions are as impartial as possible, that policies are made by disinterested men who are independent is a task which requires the same kind of high statesmanship in constructing that system as went into the making of the Constitution. The management of money—of gold, silver, credit—is a public function in a modern state. I have not felt that it is desirable to entrust the management of a $2,000,000,000 stabilization fund to any Secretary of the Treasury alone. The bill should be amended in such a way as to let President Roosevelt, the new Secretary of the Treasury, and some others appointed by the President with the consent of the Senate exercise this power for a limited period of time. At the end of that time the power of currency management should be transferred to a public agency. Mr. Roosevelt is exercising brilliant leadership and has the confidence of the country, but he might die. In building permanently we must rely not on a personality but on a principle.

The bill as submitted to Congress violates a principle which is fundamental in American life. It is the principle that powers should be subject to checks and balances. The question is fully as important as any amendment to the Constitution which has been submitted, and in spite of the popular sentiment for it I have felt free to oppose it in the hurried form in which it was brought before the House. Let us hope that the defects of the measure will be removed by the Senate with more consideration.

Mr. DUNCAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I think this is the most important piece of legislation that has been before Congress for many years. I do not think there is any question before the American people today that has held their attention and brought about quite so much thought as the system of money. It is a question that I have long been interested in. I have made many speeches in my congressional district during the past year on the question of money.

I find the people are tremendously interested in it, particularly the great masses of the people who find themselves out of employment, who find the businesses about them unable to obtain credit, who find themselves burdened with debts contracted at a time when we unquestionably had inflation, whether inflation of credit or inflation of money. So far as the prices of commodities are concerned, it does not make any difference whether those prices are brought about by inflation of money or by the extension of credit almost without limit. We are aware that during and following the war for a considerable period of time, the credit of this country and the credit of the individual was almost unlimited. As a result of easy credit obligations were incurred, obligations based upon the price of commodities; the price upon property, the price of everything we bought during that period of easy credit. And when we found ourselves in that situation, those who had controlled credit gradually took it away from us; and as they took it away from us, we found the price of all commodities for which we had gone in debt, the things which we had acquired, going down in price; but we still owed the obligations, still owed the interest upon those obligations, but the securities we had with which to meet them, and our earning power as well, was decreased and depreciated in accordance with the withdrawal of credit by those in whose hands it had been placed.

They are today the ones who are complaining about revaluing the dollar. They are not willing to be paid in the same kind of money they loaned. They want to be paid with a dollar that has twice as much purchasing power as the dollar they loaned during the time of inflation or inflated credit. We are all tremendously interested in an honest dollar, but above all, we are interested in an adequate dollar. We do not want reckless inflation, but we want enough money to carry on and conduct the business of this Nation and to pay the obligations that we created in the past. If a woman goes across her back yard and borrows a cup of sugar from her neighbor and returns that sugar in the same cup in which she got it, and the same kind of sugar, she most certainly has paid her obligation to her neighbor. Her neighbor has no right to expect her to take two cups of sugar in return for the one she borrowed. There is not enough gold in the world at its present value to furnish an adequate base for sufficient currency to meet the demands of our Nation at this time. The probabilities are there will never be enough gold to meet this demand, particularly if we base the issuance of circulating notes upon the present gold content of the gold dollar. We must either have more gold, or we must reduce the gold content of our medium of exchange.

I am not concerned with the mechanics of the bill; that is, the method of enforcing it or putting it in operation. That has been taken care of and will be taken care of by the experts and by those in the departments of government who are charged with carrying out its provision, but what we are concerned with is the effect it will have upon the prices of commodities of this country and the good that will come from its enactment. In considering any legislative act we must consider it in the light of returning the greatest good to the greatest number of people. Criticism has been offered by the opposition to the measure that it takes gold from the owners and places it in the possession of the Government. If we are to use gold as the base for the issuing of circulating notes, then we must preserve the redemption base. Gold is for the redemption of our circulating notes, yet in the past we have divided that redemption base into small parts and in turn circulated it among the people along with the other circulating medium. It seems elementary to me that this very act destroys the very foundation or the security which it is intended to create. We may compare it with the individual who lays in a supply of food to carry him over the winter, and upon acquiring it immediately begins to loan it and distribute it among his neighbors with the understanding that when he wants it for his own use they will return it to him upon request. Of course it is soon consumed and is soon spread about and is not available when desired.

This condition, which has been in existence in the past, enables those who have the means to acquire great amounts of gold to concentrate it in particular places and if they desire, to take it entirely out of circulation, they may take it even to foreign lands and deposit it in foreign banks or place it in a depository in their own country outside the reach of their Government. When this condition exists those people who have other circulating mediums of exchange, particularly during times of distress, become suspicious of the value of their money and make every effort to gather unto themselves the thing upon which it is based, the metallic base of their money. If the Government is to control the issuance of money, then it ought to control the metallic base upon which it is issued; and in no other way, it seems to me, can the confidence of the people, in the financial structure of this Nation, be maintained.

It seems to me that even after we reduce the gold content of our dollar and do all the things provided in this bill, the metallic base for an adequate circulating currency for the needs of the country not yet have been attained; and that it will be necessary to go further and to provide for the coinage of silver upon some adequate basis that will give us a further circulating medium to carry on the business and the commerce of our great and expanding country. It seems to me that only through the coinage of silver can we reclaim our foreign markets that we have lost because of its depreciation.

There are approximately 800,000,000 people in the world outside of the United States who use silver as the redemption base for their money. They have not been able to trade with us because their silver has depreciated. They must go into the markets of the world and buy gold with which to pay us, thus resulting in the loss of their markets to our people. The United States produces approximately 70 percent of the silver of the world and we ought to give it a more prominent place in our monetary system. Every republic to the south of us is on the silver standard. The oriental nations likewise use silver as a basis for their money. Their trade is lost to us, and will be lost to us until some system is worked out by which they can use their money at its fair value.

I have every confidence that under the leadership of the President of the United States, Congress will make provision for the remonetization of silver. I think that the sentiment of this Congress is overwhelmingly in favor of it. I think they realize the necessity of it, and that it will soon be an accomplished fact.

The people are beginning to realize that the financial system of this country has too long been in the hands of a few people who were using it for their own selfish interests; that whenever there was a conflict between the masses and the interests who were controlling money, the interests benefited.

Mr. Speaker, I repeat that this law we are passing today is the greatest thing that has been done in carrying out the new deal; that it will result in wider-spread good to the country generally than anything else this Congress has done. It will provide us with a sound and honest system of money, and in bringing it about it does not give to banks that have acquired seven eighths of our gold supply the right to enjoy the profits that will come from the action we are taking today. It will come into the possession of the Government, where it belongs; it will give the profit to the Government, where it belongs.

Mr. TERRELL of Texas. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House of Representatives, "Times change and men change with them, but sound principles endure forever."

We are confronted with a condition and not a theory. This condition has produced more loose thinking approaching hysteria than anything ever confronting a distracted people. There seems to be no time or inclination for sober, sound thinking. This superficial thinking is not confined to any particular class or section, but is Nation-wide and seems to be the result of present depressed conditions. Our great President has been doing some sound thinking, even though all his thinking may not be sound. You remember that he said that he did not expect to make a hit every time he goes to bat, but hoped for a 75 percent batting average—and I believe he has made that grade.

As far back as March 4, 1933, the President declared that our financial system had broken down and the money changers should be driven from the temple of government.

This devaluation of the gold dollar to cheapen money and enhance commodity prices and increase purchasing and debt-paying power and restore prosperity has received the most serious thought by the President and his advisors, and it is the President's plan to restore to the Government the constitutional authority to issue money and regulate its value.

There is much being said about the panic and its causes and cures by emergency legislation, which is constitutional in times of distress and great public calamity and unconstitutional in prosperous times. It is my opinion that all necessary relief could be accomplished by constitutional measures. This doctrine that the Constitution can be changed by declaring that a great public emergency exists is not supported by the proper interpretation of the plain language in which it is written. Whatever it meant at the time of its adoption, it still means. It cannot mean one thing yesterday, another today, and still another tomorrow. It has no elastic or hidden powers to be brought forth in times of distress. The tenth amendment limits it to the expressed powers and this amendment is still a part of the Constitution.

I am not attempting to apply the Constitution to the bill under consideration—this will be done by the Supreme Court in the course of time, and Congress will have to conform its laws to that decision. It has decided that the President can make tariff laws and that the States can impair the obligations of contracts, and Congress need not worry about the constitutionality of laws.

As the President has plainly indicated, the panic was caused by the failure of our financial system to function; he has now submitted his remedy to cure the cause of this breakdown, and he is fortified in his plans by an opinion from the Attorney General (which is at least persuasive) that his plan is legal and it is our duty to give careful consideration to this plan or present something better; and we have presented nothing better.

A panic such as we have endured (and which I hope is passing) in the midst of plenty, is nothing less than a crime against our Government and people who have produced in abundance.

There is but one major cause for this panic, and that is the concentration of idle capital in the hands of a few people, and taking it out of legitimate business channels; and this should be forever prohibited by any lawful legislation that can be enacted.

Remember, that it is not working capital that has caused this devastating depression, but idle capital. "An idle brain is the devil's workshop," and idle capital paralyzes every workshop.

Something must now be done to prevent the concentration of this idle capital in a few hands. This can only be done by taking the issuance, control, and regulation of the value of money away from the financial interests that have prostituted that control for private purposes and wrecked a prosperous people, and place that control in Congress, where the Constitution places it.

Whether the bill under consideration is the best plan that could be devised, is debatable, but the best minds in the country on both sides of this question have presented their views to the President; and after careful consideration the President has presented this plan which we have before us, and the overwhelming majority of the House seems to favor the bill, notwithstanding some seemingly sound objections to it. Every amendment has been voted down except those offered by the committee, which indicates that the bill will pass in its present form.

I had intended to waive my objections to parts of the bill and vote for it, because I felt that it is absolutely necessary for the Government to issue, regulate, and control the value of the money in order to maintain a proper parity between the value of the dollar and the prices of labor and products for which the dollar is exchanged; and I still believe that this is necessary to reestablish and maintain business on a sound basis.

But after studying the three bills, all introduced by the same man, and two of them reported by the same committee, of which the author is chairman, I discovered that the bills were all different and I could not tell which one was the bill approved by the President and sent to the committee for its O.K. So I am compelled to vote against the bill because of one very objectionable and dangerous feature not in the original bill approved by the President and introduced by the Chairman of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, and that is the $10,000,000,000 bond issue.

I will denominate these bills nos. 1, 2, and 3. No. 1, H.R. 6979, introduced January 16.

A bill to protect the currency system of the United States, to provide for the better use of the monetary gold stock of the United States, and for other purposes.

This bill has 11 pages and 16 sections. It was not reported out of the committee, though it is supposed to be the original bill sent to the committee by the President. It contained no mention of Government bond issues. Bill no. 2, H.R. 6976, introduced in the House January 16.

A bill to prpotect the currency system of the United States, to provide for the better use of the monetary gold stock of the United States, and for other purposes.

This bill was reported to the House with amendments January 18. This bill has 18 pages and 17 sections and contains authority for the issuance by the Secretary of the Treasury of $7,500,000,000 in bonds. It differs in many respects from the first bill. Bill no. 3, H.R. 6976, in the House January 16.

A bill to protect the currency system of the United States, to provide for the better use of the monetary gold stock of the United States, and for other purposes.

These other purposes cover a multitude of sins against the people, one of which is the $10,000,000,000 bond issue. This bill was reported to the House with amendments January 18. It contains 11 pages and 20 sections, and differs from the other two bills. It contains a provision for the issuance of $10,000,000,000 in Government bonds. Many Members did not have this bill during the discussion, but I got a copy of it a short time before the discussion closed.

The first bill did not contain a provision for the issuance of Government bonds, and I expected to vote for it, notwithstanding my objection to the unlimited authority granted the Secretary of the Treasury in handling the $2,000,000,000 stabilization fund. This authority is very great, and Congress should not surrender its constitutional right to hold to strict accountability every Government official who handles public funds. In this bill Congress surrenders its right to demand an accounting of all public funds for 3 years, which is time enough to involve us in war and wreck the Government.

This tremendous authority in the hands of one man, coupled with the authority to issue $10,000,000,000 in interest-bearing tax-free bonds, is the last straw that broke the camel's back and is a load greater than I can carry and be honest with the people I represent. I regret that I cannot follow our leaders all the way, but I would rather be right than regular.

Just why this bond issue was slipped into this bill at the eleventh hour and not discussed by the newspapers and by Members of the House is a mystery that may never be solved, but I usually form conclusions from circumstances surrounding the situation.

The devaluation of the gold dollar so as to bring three and a half billion dollars into the Treasury and take the gold away from the Federal Reserve banks and cheapen the buying power of the dollar and increase commodity prices and debt-paying power had been freely discussed in the papers and by Members of Congress and had struck a popular chord.

It was easy to see that such an act would be passed by an overwhelming majority, and by tacking the $10,000,000,000 bond issue onto this popular measure it could be passed without the serious opposition it would encounter as a separate bill. This is good strategy but not fair to the public. Every bill should stand upon its own merits and not force Members to vote for bad measures because they are coupled with popular measures.

This procedure could not be followed in my State, because our constitution forbids it. Bills must contain but one main subject, and that must be embraced in the caption of the bill, and nothing can be slipped into the body of the bill that is not in the caption. No bill can be amended by reference to its title or section, but the language in such section must be brought forward in the new amendment, leaving out only the words to be eliminated and inserting the words to be added, thus making a complete paragraph or section. This is a safe provision, as it enables all members to know what the proposed change does to the original act. I wish such a constitutional provision applied to amendments to bills in Congress. We could then understand the change, which is impossible now. No Member can hunt up all the acts by Congress for the last decade and see what "paragraph C, section D," is, and no member of the committees in charge can give the information, for it is only known by the men who write the bills, administer the laws, and spend the money dished out to them.

GOVERNMENT BONDS

The Government has for many years depended upon borrowing money by bond issues, when its revenues were less than its expenditures, or in cases of war or other unforseen conditions that cause extraordinary expenditures.

Every war in which we have engaged has caused large bond issues by the Government but none to compare with the amounts issued during the World War and during this depression. Not only the Federal Government but many State governments and municipal governments are loaded down with bond issues, which they cannot pay, and some of them have defaulted and others are asking the Federal Government to come to their relief.

The Federal Government has outstanding interest-bearing bonds to the amount of about $21,000,000,000 and the bill under consideration authorizes the issuance of 10 billion more, making a total of outstanding bond issue of $31,000,000,000, when they are issued. This debt is greater than the peak of the World War debt by several billions, and no one knows how we can get the money to pay the debt and the tremendous interest which at 4 percent would amount to more than $1,000,000,000 annually.

The Government cannot borrow itself out of debt or bring prosperity to an impoverished people by taking all their property and earnings to pay this tremendous tax burden, any more than one can lift himself up by his bootstraps. No Member of this House will live long enough to see this Government out of debt unless a wholesale repudiation or revolution takes place during his lifetime.

The policy of issuing interest-bearing bonds to run the Government is a relic of banker control of the money of the country and should be terminated as the Government takes charge of issuing money and regulating and controlling its value in the interest of the public and not in the interest of the banker.

It will require one more step to free the people from the iron hand of banker control of the money, and that is to stop issuing interest-bearing tax-free bonds based on the credit and taxpaying power of the people and issue new non-interest-bearing Treasury notes based upon the ability of the people to redeem them with their taxes, whenever redemption becomes necessary to maintain them at par with all other lawful money in the country and save the interest. This was done by Abraham Lincoln during the Civil War and it helped to save the Union and it has always been good money, in spite of the effort to impair its debt-paying power by legislation.

These notes should be good for all debts, public and private, and should be redeemable in other lawful money at the option of the Government. This money could be paid out for labor and material on all public works, and to pay the soldiers' bonus and go directly into circulation and greatly relieve the present money stringency. Some of the greatest economists in the country approve this as a sound governmental policy.

I am for sound money and the Government is going to keep her money sound, but not so darned sound that it requires twice as much labor or products to buy a dollar as it required when it was not so sound.

The dollar for the past 4 years has been the most unsound and most dishonest dollar ever stamped by the Government, and this dishonest dollar is now on the road to the junk heap, I hope never to return to curse a long-suffering, peaceful people.

We have heard a great deal about fiat money and printing-press money. All our money is fiat money because it requires the fiat or stamp of the Government to make it money. Even gold and silver are not money without the fiat of the Government. All the paper money is printing-press money containing the fiat of the Government, and it is just as good as the Government's ability to pay is good. It never can and never will be redeemed in gold.

If we continue to issue bonds and the Government begins to default on the interest, does anyone think our bonds will remain at par? They will not; and if the Government issues too many noninterest-bearing dollars and they get too plentiful and prices become too high, they will not have the purchasing power they should have; then the Government will stop issuing them and may redeem them until they increase in purchasing power to a proper parity with the price of commodities.

Nothing is behind the Government bonds except the Government's taxing power to redeem them, and the same taxing power would be behind the treasury notes to redeem them, and the Government could float as many dollars in these notes as it floats in bonds without impairing the credit of the country.

There is no difference except that notes draw no interest and circulate as money and can pay labor, buy goods, and pay debts, while the bonds do not circulate as money and can be used only as a basis for the issuance of bank notes, and the most of them are locked up in a vault and are worthless to the country and serve as a refuge for idle capital that ought to be invested in business industries to employ labor and produce useful products for the people, and would be so invested if there were no interest-bearing, tax-free bonds in which to invest.

These tremendous bond issues cause an orgy of spending public money; and every State, county, and municipality, and business concern in the country are trying to get their hands in the Public Treasury.

I have on my desk a list of 370 applications from Texas to the P.W.A. and R.F.C. for Government money, ranging in amounts from $1,000 up to $8,900,000; the total running into hundreds of millions of dollars. This list embraces applications up to January 1, 1934, and many more have been filed since that date; and these applications come from every State, asking similar or even greater amounts.

The Washington hotels are crowded with lawyer lobbyists trying to get appointments for political friends or trying to get their hands into the Public Treasury.

The pressure has become so great upon the Government officials that the President has felt compelled to call public attention to it and try to stop such political influence. These requests for loans and donations come from State governments, colleges, universities, and public schools; from counties, municipalities, school districts, drainage districts, reclamation districts, and every conceivable division of the Government. They are for water works, light plants, sewerage systems; and then come requests for loans to build and equip cotton gins, mills, elevators, stores, and manufacturing plants, and for many purposes that cannot be enumerated here. The most of these requests, totaling billions of dollars, would have never been heard of or even thought of, if Congress had never adopted the plan of acting Santa Claus to all the States and people.

When and where shall we stop this Government Santa Claus business and return to constitutional, economical, and efficient government? I fear we have gone too far already and cannot stop without causing more trouble than we are now trying to cure. We may have crossed the Rubicon before we know it and sowed the seed for the destruction of our republican government—thus following the history of other republics.

Mr. BERLIN. Mr. Speaker, the bill now before this body is perhaps the most important economic measure to be introduced here for many years. Indeed, it is said by more than a few authorities and in the press, that it is the most important monetary legislation since the Civil War.

Mr. Speaker, I am for this bill. I am for it because it is an administration measure, and I am pledged to my constituents to support all administration legislation and thus give force and meaning to the new deal insofar as that is within my power.

But there is another reason. This measure is one which goes to the very fundamentals of monetary theory. It is not a subject which can be, or indeed should be, debated indefinitely within this Chamber. The technicalities involved make it impossible for those of us, who have not spent a lifetime in the study of money and its allied problems, to pass final judgment upon its provisions. That, Mr. Speaker, is work for experts. It is their duty and not the prerogative of the layman.

This bill, which so deeply affects the economic life of our Nation, has been submitted to Congress for its approval by the President, or upon his recommendation. It has behind it the studied judgment of experts, men who have for years given their close attention to the problems involved. Out of that experience, have come the conclusions which are embodied in this measure. Upon the experience of these men the President has drawn, adding, I am sure, recommendations and advice of his own. He has, no doubt, tempered their academic suggestions with less rigid opinions in the interests of the whole people, and so the bill has come to us from the administration as its best judgment on the disease which it seeks to cure.

Far-reaching beneficial results are predicted for this bill. This is the opinion of the President and his advisors, and I am sure that the same opinion of it is held by many of my colleagues on this floor on both sides of the aisle. It is difficult, Mr. Speaker, for me to understand how any Member of this body can attempt, with any degree of certainty, as, I regret to say, some have, to flatly contradict the predictions and expectations set forth by the President and his advisors. True, men may differ, but in the end there can be no one who can, I feel, conscientiously say that this measure attempts anything but the greatest good for the greatest number of people.

This measure is a very definite and very courageous attempt, as I see it, to break away from the cold and insensible control of the money changers. It appears, and appears with some clarity, that the principal opposition to this measure arises from that quarter. This measure upsets the dogmas, the inflexible beliefs and precepts of that very nearly discredited section of our population. In their anger at what they consider an unwarranted intrusion upon their preserves, they condemn this measure as direct inflation, wild inflation, burglarizing the vaults of the Federal Reserve banks, and as a long step toward the printing of greenbacks, all of which they point out must be accompanied by financial chaos.

Mr. Speaker, the only prediction, assertion, or allegation they make in connection with this bill that I consider bears any semblance of accuracy is their prediction of the dire results that would follow wild inflation, by which is meant starting the printing presses. When they point out the disaster that follows the indiscriminate printing of money they are right, but that is the only point they make that seems to me worthy of recognition.

They confuse the issue. They seem to be attempting to obscure the merits, and mislead the public with their assertions of impending disaster if this bill is passed. They have, it would appear, neither read the bill nor turned an intelligent ear to editorial and expert opinion which has appeared in print since this bill was made public by its introduction here. Nor, I might add, have they interpreted with any intention of understanding, the President's message to this Congress when he requested that such legislation be passed.

Had they read the bill, or the adequate explanations of it that have been available for days, they would not make the regrettable mistake of talking about wild inflation in connection with this legislation.

Mr. Speaker, if there is any man in or out of this Chamber, who, after conscientiously studying this measure, can point to any section of it which can be construed as authority for starting the printing presses on an orgy of paper and ink, I should like to hear him speak.

As to the dangerous inflationary tendencies of this bill, I should like to call the attention of this House to the remarks of the man who is perhaps closer to the President in matters of monetary policy than all others. This man is Prof. George F. Warren, of Cornell University. Professor Warren is admittedly one of the President's principal advisors on money matters.

Perhaps you have noticed that Professor Warren has, in the opposition press, been referred to consistently as "a dairy expert from Cornell." That characterization of Professor Warren is meant to belittle him as a monetary adviser to the administration. It is an attempt, gentlemen, to make it appear that Professor Warren is not qualified to advise the President and the Treasury of the United States on the highly technical and difficult problems involved in money and the management of the national currency.

The attempt to discredit Professor Warren by implication and innuendo, by leaving unmentioned those marks in his career which would indicate his qualification to advise the President and the Treasury in this matter, has, I am sure, created an unfortunate impression in the minds of many persons who must depend upon the opposition press for their knowledge of current affairs.

Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to digress, but I feel that I should set forth at this time a clearer picture of Professor Warren for the benefit of those Members of this body who may have been misled by repeated reference to this man as "a dairy expert, who is advising the President on monetary affairs."

Professor Warren has made a study of commodity prices and gold, their effect upon each other, and consequently upon the living and working conditions of every man, woman, and child in the country. This is not to say that Professor Warren is an infallible authority on the subjects upon which he has spent years of study. No man can point a definite, an absolute path out of the economic forest into which the money changers have led us. But I assert, Mr. Speaker, that a man who has devoted 15 or 17 years of intensive study, research, and thought to certain problems, is surely qualified to speak, to advise with authority, upon the opinions which he has derived from his labors. That as I see it, is the position of Professor Warren, and if the press generally had been more conscientious and less indifferent to the background from which Professor Warren speaks, there would not be any feeling of uncertainty or doubt as to the qualifications of this, perhaps chief of the President's monetary advisers.

There is nothing secretive or mysterious about Professor Warren's theories. I shall not take the time of the House to discuss them now, but I would suggest that any man who wishes to inform himself as to the basis for Professor Warren's thought on monetary subjects, purchase a copy of Prices, written by Professor Warren. There he will find the whole thing explained.

Now then, Mr. Speaker, I return to the money changers and their opposition to this bill and their talk of wild inflation.

Professor Warren appeared before the Senate Banking and Currency Committee to testify as to his opinion of the Roosevelt monetary policy as outlined by the President in his message to Congress last January 15 and as given concrete form in the measure now before this body.

To anyone who had any doubts as to Professor Warren's attitude toward direct or wild inflation, his testimony before the Senators must have erased any questions they had in mind, as well as comforted them no end. Professor Warren is, upon his own word, an opponent of wild inflation.

To the Senators he presented a scholarly and factual account of his theory and its effects to date, as reflected in its adoption by the administration. But, first, let me quote Professor Warren's reply to inferences that certain monetary policies would lead to wild inflation. He had gone far back in history to trace monetary conditions, practices, and results. Professor Warren said:

> Occasions of extreme inflation have been preceded by government bankruptcy and revolution or war. If we drifted into wild inflation it would be an unusual historical event unless we had a revolution—I mean, a violent revolution.

Those, gentlemen, are the words of the President's monetary expert. They are plain words, plainly spoken. It would indeed be difficult, I am sure, for any Member of this body to believe that Professor Warren is a champion of wild inflation after reading this testimony.

And now, Mr. Speaker, I turn to the so-called "60-cent dollar" which is to become an actuality under this measure when it is finally passed by the Congress. I say "60-cent dollar." More accurately, I should say a "50- to 60-cent dollar." I might also say, and not be indulging my fancy, an honest dollar. The attempt has been made by opponents of this plan to frighten the citizens into believing that cutting the dollar in half will double prices and so increase 100 percent their cost of living.

Mr. Speaker, it is almost ludicrous to consider such propaganda. It seems to me that a man, any man, facing the issue honestly and intelligently, would see at first glance that it is impossible that this administration, or any other, for that matter, could possibly recommend legislation that would bankrupt every wage and salary earner in the land. That is what would happen if prices doubled, if the expenses of home, of farm, and of factory doubled over night with the revaluation of the dollar downward by 50 percent.

The money changers, gentlemen, were never smart. They were never intelligent. They were merely traders upon the credulity of the American people. Their currency was deceit. They raised themselves to a position which by its very height seemed to necessitate our looking up to them. Their fine phrases and graceful gestures (financial) did, I regret to say, deceive us tragically. We believed that these men, who stood upon an economic and financial eminence deserved our respect and admiration. Then, gentlemen, we discovered to our sorrow, and to their disgrace, that their feet were in the mire, and the eminence upon which they seemed to stand was no more than a flimsy frame disguised with gilt and cheaper trappings.

There is no man, Mr. Speaker, who rises to eminence in his chosen field by honor and the common virtues but for whom I have the highest respect. There are many bankers, no doubt, many business men and financiers who have at least tried to abide by a code of common decency. But, gentlemen, the greatest of them have been found, unfortunately, to be no better in their business relations than the most brazen thug. These men are now seeking to regain their former illusory reputations. They are seeking once more a hold upon us such as they enjoyed with immunity before. Therefore, it behooves us, and it is the duty of every Member of this Congress, regardless of the side of the aisle upon which he finds himself, to examine closely, scrupulously, and patiently the statements that these men are now making in an attempt to discredit the efforts of the President and his administration in the present issue.

As I see it, Mr. Speaker, this bill seeks to wrest from Wall Street and the practitioners therein the rights of the citizens of this country that Wall Street preempted in the days of our questionable prosperity—the right of the people to control, through the President, his advisors and, the Congress, the money which is the blood of their economic existence.

The 50- to 60-cent dollar is, I believe, designed to return to the people a currency which is within their reach. It is an attempt to give them a currency with which to pay their bills and buy their bread; that is, the currency in which they contracted their debts. Is their any justice, Mr. Speaker, in the position of a debtor who contracted a debt, perhaps for a home, by pledging dollars worth 100 cents and finding when the debt becomes due that he must pay in a dollar worth 150 cents? I dare say, Mr. Speaker, that none here will support such injustice, such inequality.

I referred a moment ago to the fact that it appears to be the desire of the opponents of this measure, particularly those who have found 150-cent dollars so profitable, to convey the impression that prices will double under this bill.

Mr. Speaker, here again a very superficial examination of the facts existing today effectively answers these purveyors of misconception. The day upon which the President sent his monetary message to Congress the dollar was quoted at approximately 60 cents in the foreign-exchange markets. Sixty cents, gentlemen, is the upper limit at which the President would set the value of the dollar. The recent months of application of the Warren theories may be said generally to have brought the dollar to the 60-cent level.

What does that mean to the objectors who talk about doubled prices? It means simply this: That the dollar already is within easy walking distance, you might say, of the point at which the President will devalue it. In other words, Mr. Speaker, it is not now a 100-cent, or 150-cent dollar that is to be devalued. It is a 60-cent, a 61- or 62-cent dollar that is to get the President's attention under this measure.

That in turn means, Mr. Speaker, that devaluation cannot proceed more than another 10 cents, and that, I contend, will not, cannot by any stretch of the imagination, double prices to the consumer, or even approach such a condition. The dollar has been devalued already to nearly the limit asked in this bill, and I think that that point should be emphasized.

Prices have risen since the Warren theories were put to the test. That was necessary. It is necessary that they increase further, for it is upon an increase in prices, prices to the farmer in particular, that the success of the new deal depends.

Make no mistake, gentlemen, about this price business. Prices must go up, but they must go up honestly. It is the profiteer's price, the price exacted of us by the greedy merchant, financier, and business man, that we must guard against, and it is the intention, indeed, it is in many instances the accomplished fact, of this administration that the greedy have been abruptly checked in pursuing their greedy ends by unjustly raising prices.

From June to December of last year, under the Roosevelt administration's gold and money policy, the cost of living index rose 5 percent. However, all you have to do is look about you to see that the improvement in unemployment conditions, in business, and our economic condition generally, has greatly exceeded 5 percent. In other words, gentlemen, if you were earning $20 per week, would you not be willing to spend an additional dollar on your living expenses to help restore to this country the conditions which President Roosevelt and his administration seek to give us? I think you would. I think you could make no better investment, nor one about which you should complain less.

In connection with this point I quote the words of Professor Warren in the matter of current prices and their reflection in wages and salaries. He says, for instance:

> Any person working on a salary and not given extreme cuts would be faring better (under revaluation) than before the depression. Any person who is getting his 1929 salary has much more now than then, but not so much as last February.

Now then, I come to the business of seizing the gold in the vaults of the Federal Reserve banks. On this point we hear the opponents shouting about "stealing somebody's gold." When the Treasury takes over this gold, the United States Government is not going to run away with it, and in that it will be somewhat different than some of our money changers. The gold will be placed in safekeeping in the vaults of the United States Treasury, where it is to remain as the solid, sound backing of the paper money that passes through our hands. This gold will not, by some mysterious trick of the hand, or some strange chemical reaction, be changed into dust, or worthless substance. It will still be gold. It will still exist in fact. And it will be in the honest hands of your Government. The word seizure in connection with the process of transferring title of this gold from the Federal Reserve banks to the United States Treasury, is perhaps misleading. By seizure we are prone to believe that the property is being summarily taken without payment or compensation of any kind. This is not what is proposed under this measure. What the Treasury takes it will pay for. It will pay the Federal Reserve banks with gold certificates, "yellow backs", as we knew them when we used to see them in circulation, or when those fortunate enough to earn them, possessed a few. These gold certificates will be used by the Federal Reserve banks as backing for their currency issues, providing the Treasury authorizes such issuance.

By transferring title to this gold—and I can think of no place it will be safer or more judiciously employed than by the Federal Government—by transferring title, a certain profit will accrue to the Federal Government, a profit of several billions of dollars. This is due to the fact that the Treasury will pay the Federal Reserve banks the statutory price of $20.67 per ounce for the banks' gold and will value it for its own purposes at the current market price set by the Treasury, which is considerably higher than the statutory figure. This proceeding is attacked as unfair, the opponents contending that the holder of the gold should be paid the higher price.

It seems to me that the value of a commodity is largely determined by what it will bring in the market place. There can hardly be any other adequate measure. The only person who may purchase this vast gold reserve is the Federal Treasury. The Treasury offers $20.67 per ounce, which is the price set by the law. It is a price long established. It is the price upon which the holders of that gold based their purchases, though they may have paid more for it. But they have used this gold many years now. They have, that is, the money changers have, played with the Nation's gold too long. They have taken profits, vast profits, with their gold policies. The Government proposes to pay the base price for this commodity. Perhaps the Government would like to pay more. The Government is not out to hurt people's feelings or crush their pocketbooks. But there is not an unlimited choice here, gentlemen, and the Government is doing what it thinks best for all the people and not what the golden few would like.

The President proposes to set up, out of the profits of this title transfer, what will be known as an equalization fund. This fund is to be used in the support of our position in the hard mart of international exchange. But that is not all. It is apparent, and it is also the opinion of the President, that the money changers have sought by crude and obstructionist tactics to force down the price of Government securities such as Government bonds. They have done this by dumping them on the market and so depressing the price. They have not done this through any honest conviction that the value of these bonds is endangered, or that they have actually lost value. They have done it, gentlemen, in a direct and brazen attempt to frustrate the administration's monetary policies because those policies did not suit their selfish purposes.

These traders realize that the safest obligation in the country is an obligation of the United States Treasury. They know that this is the general belief. All right, they say, then we will drive down the prices of these bonds and people will become frightened and think there is really cause to be alarmed at the credit or security of the Government. By this means these financial buzzards seek to bring pressure indirectly upon the administration, pressure that they cannot exert openly or directly. And they cannot assert it openly or directly, gentlemen, because the administration has no sympathy or confidence in such discredited traders.

So, part of this equalization fund, the strength of which will be the strength of $2,000,000,000, will be used for the purchase of our own Government obligations at any time that these men see fit to play their dumping game. Two billion dollars is pressure that they cannot meet. The Treasury will take any and all the pressure these men can apply—and gentlemen, the Treasury can take it. The purchase of these securities, when and if offered in this Wall Street manner, will keep their price up where that price belongs as a true measure of the Treasury's credit; and so the administration plans once more to defeat the tactics of the Street.

In its international application, the equalization fund will be used to control the price of our dollar in foreign markets. England has an equalization fund for this purpose; that is, for the purpose of controlling the price of the pound sterling. France is generally believed to work through the Bank of France for the same control of the franc. Up to now, we have not had adequate instruments to meet the challenges of France and England in the international exchange market. Under this bill we have. Our fund is larger than Britain's. I hope that it will not be necessary to use it ruthlessly, and it is the President's hope, and I see no reason why it should not be realized, that armed with this fund, he will be able to exert such a powerful influence in the exchange market that world stabilization of currencies will become a fact. That is the goal. Endless fighting back and forth in the money market will do no country good and will engender much hard feeling. The President proposes to put an end to this bickering, this fencing with money, but he has not been in a position to do so, but this bill is intended to equip this country to step into the market and bring order out of chaos.

By stabilizing the currencies of the world, world trade will be promoted, world economy strengthened, and world peace promoted.

The President has repeatedly asserted that it is his ambition that we may be brought to a position where we may enjoy a "more abundant life." Mr. Speaker, it is my belief that this bill will further that ambition. It is my earnest desire that this legislation be supported by every Member of this House.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Speaker, the debate on the measure discloses that even the committee in charge of the bill are divided as to its purposes and the effect of its provisions. It is admittedly experimental. It makes vital changes in our entire financial system. It is the most momentous in its possibilities of any money bill in half a century.

The bill is a long step in the right direction, but it only goes half way. It disposes of gold, but leaves silver on the doorstep. Placing the Nation's entire gold stock in the Federal Treasury and under absolute control of the Government is a distinct advance toward the goal of divorcing money from private and corporate control. I have no fear that the power granted to the President and the Secretary of the Treasury will be abused or used against the best interests of the people. President Roosevelt has the confidence of the people as few Presidents have had. By the provisions of this act, he has determined the part that gold shall play in our monetary system. I sincerely hope he will save silver as money in his next move for currency reform.

The power of administration must be placed where the light of public opinion is most powerful and the President is the proper person to control and administer this great trust. The power to control the gold of the Nation will be of great value in stabilizing the value of the American dollar in relation to currencies and commodities of other nations.

The authority to devaluate the dollar to at least 60 percent of its present value is also a valuable advance in the direction of a lower-priced dollar and a consequent increase in commodity prices measured by that dollar. But the devaluation proposed must actually take place before any substantial benefit from rising prices will result. Under the bill, when once determined, devaluation of the gold dollar must be between values of 50 and 60 percent of the present dollar. The bill completely eliminates gold as a part of our circulating medium as money. All gold will be held by the Federal Treasury, either as bullion or gold certificates, as reserves for Federal currency and Reserve bank notes. This change in the basic monetary law makes more essential and necessary the addition of silver and silver certificates to increase the volume of actual money in circulation and to supply the money needed to sustain the commerce of the Nation at a prosperous level.

We are told that Professor Warren, once a Nebraska farmer in the district I have the honor to represent and a teacher of agricultural economics at Cornell University, has had much to do with preparing the plan proposed in this bill. He has heretofore often pointed out that high-priced gold is always accompanied by low-priced commodities. High-priced gold results from increased demand. Improved commodity prices, if Professor Warren is correct, are, therefore, dependent upon falling gold values. With the principal nations struggling for gold, no wonder prices fall.

The N.R.A. has helped prices of manufactured products to higher levels, but agricultural prices which are not controlled by the price fixing of the N.R.A. have not risen in comparison. Prices of basic farm products are below cost of production and still falling. For instance in December, last, hog prices declined 19 percent; butter and cheese, 14 percent; eggs, 16 percent; lard, 13 percent; and meats, 4 percent. Prices for these products were the lowest in a generation before the declines noted.

These conditions are primarily the result of the disastrous deflation following the Great War and ending in the bursting of the 1929 boom resulting from an unparalleled credit inflation by bank credits and bank checks. During the boom period there was a tremendous inflation of debt and bank credits, not measured by millions but by billions. Since 1929, there has been a deflation of bank credits and bank checks of many more billions than the amount of the national debt with the 10-billion proposed increase added.

The only way to put prices back to where payment of our national and private debts is possible is to inflate either with paper credit, represented by notes and bonds, or with money based upon both gold and silver. To raise prices by credit inflation is always dangerous. Every increase of actual money in circulation stimulates trade and commerce, increases commodity prices, and makes more easy the liquidation of all debts, both public and private.

Debts that cannot be paid are at the bottom of the economic troubles of the world. Nations and people must have a readjustment of money values and prices or liquidate by bankruptcy. We cannot borrow ourselves out of debt nor tax ourselves into prosperity with the present high-priced dollar. The sure road to recovery is to authorize payment with a cheaper dollar. Cut the gold dollar in half and lift silver to her ancient place, and we can pay ourselves out without repudiation.

The farmer suffers most of all under present economic conditions. Some would attempt to save him by giving him greater credit facilities. Further agricultural credit without a rise in prices is only putting off the day of disaster. What the farmer needs is not the chance to borrow more money, but a price for his products that will enable him to pay what he has already borrowed. The restoration of silver to its former position as basic money will increase the volume of money in circulation and thereby advance the price of all our commodities measured in money. It will increase prices and double the debtor's ability to pay his debts and discharge his bond.

It is difficult to lower the price of gold with the world competing for it. Advance in prices of commodities measured by bimetallic money employing both gold and silver is sure and certain. With the passage of H.R. 6976, the pending bill, we will abandon a coined-metal reserve for our money. Treasury reserves will consist of gold-bullion bars measured in value by the declared content of the gold dollar. Gold sold to the Treasury will be paid for by gold certificates or any lawful money. Gold or silver bullion presented for coinage or sale to the Treasury, under my bill H.R. 6191, would be paid for by silver or gold certificates or lawful money. The price of silver would soon rise to its value as money and lift enormously the buying power of all countries where silver is the measure of commodity values.

Before the collapse of credit and bank inflation in 1929 we were selling 5 billions in goods to foreign nations. Two billions of this export was agricultural. Prices of all farm products were profitable to the farmer and every branch of industry felt the favor of the farmers' sustained buying power. The restoration of silver as money will be the most powerful factor in recovering our lost export trade. With the restoration of our former world markets the surplus problem will disappear.

Mr. STRONG of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I am sure every person who has given the matter earnest consideration, is convinced the reason for the business depression is the need of sufficient money in circulation.

The Constitution plainly empowers Congress to issue money and regulate its value, and when Congress obeys that plain and simple demand of the Constitution the awful depression, which is causing such intense suffering of millions of people throughout the Nation, will pass away; and if Congress continues to do its duty in regard to expanding the circulation of money and properly regulating its value, it will be impossible for panics to occur further in the United States at any time.

Those who have observed the trend of financial affairs know that Congress has not obeyed the plain mandates of the Constitution in regard to the circulation of money and regulating its value, but has allowed this important function of government to be controlled by a few malicious manipulators, who have wrecked the farming interests, the banking interests, the mercantile interests, the manufacturing interests, and all other legitimate business of the Nation.

When President Roosevelt was inaugurated, millions of people were suffering intensely from want of food, clothing, and shelter. It was absolutely necessary that relief should be furnished these suffering people at the earliest time possible; so the President at once inaugurated measures of temporary relief which have been vigorously administered throughout the Nation and much suffering has been relieved, and the temporary relief measures are still in rapid execution. While the temporary relief is being administered, the President and Congress are putting forth efforts to correct the financial system of our country in order to make it impossible for panics in business ever again to occur in this country. Indications point to a complete overthrow of the malicious manipulators of the finances of our country, and permanent relief will be brought to the people by the present session of Congress.

When those who favor permanent relief to the people urge the expansion of the circulation of money, these malicious money manipulators who have caused all the suffering of millions of people begin to yell "flat money" and "printing-press money" and assert such money will be worthless because it is based on nothing, and many other false sayings. But that is all they can do. They know Congress is empowered by the Constitution of the United States to control the circulation of money and regulate its value. They also know that money legally issued and its value regulated according to law and common sense is the best money in the world. Therefore, in order to continue their malicious manipulation of the money of the country, in order that it may be scarce and the rate of interest high, and in order to deceive the people and keep the people in bondage where all kinds of suffering exist, they yell all kinds of false propaganda.

There should be no speculation in money; it should at all times be plentiful and the interest rate low. This would cause prices of real estate, livestock, farm products, and all other property to advance and such prices to be governed, as they should, by supply and demand. Wages and salaries would also be raised and would maintain a steady schedule, and the millions of people now idle would be reemployed.

In discussing the money question with a good friend, whose every impulse is for the benefit of all the people, and who is a very able man and has for many years made a special study of finances, he said that the average citizen views the money question as a very intricate and puzzling proposition which only a few experts understand. He illustrates by saying that the proper and rightful circulation of money is as plain and simple as the circulation of water through a water system when a man is sitting on the water main near a cut-off with a wrench in his hands. This man can cause the water to circulate throughout the entire system in the exact quantity needed. My good friend claims the lawful and proper circulation of money is just as easily understood.

It has been stated in the discussion of the money question by eminent patriotic statesmen that if they could control the circulation of money in any country, they could absolutely control the entire government. We know this is true, and the great battle now on is to liberate our Government from the malicious dictatorship of the manipulators of our money system. This can be done, but it is a hard fight and will require the efforts of all who desire to see our Government administered in favor of all the people.

All will remember that Henry Ford offered to take over Muscle Shoals and operate it, paying the Government a large profit. It required an expenditure of $30,000,000 by the Government to complete the Muscle Shoals plant for operation. Congress refused to expend this amount, claiming it did not want to increase the Government indebtedness, as the money would have to be borrowed for the completion of the plant. Mr. Edison, the wonderful inventor and economist, was asked to inspect Muscle Shoals, and while there the following statement was made by him:

If the currency is issued, $30,000,000, for financing the finishing construction of Muscle Shoals work, it will be the proper thing to do. Once the currency method is tried in raising money for public improvements, the country will never go back to the bond method.

Make it perfectly clear that I'm not advocating any changes in the banks and banking. Banks are a mighty good thing. They are essential to the commerce of the country. It is the money broker, the money profiteer, the private banker that I oppose. They gain their power through a fictitious and false value given to gold. Gold is a relic of Julius Caesar, and interest is an invention of Satan.

There is a complete set of misleading slogans kept on hand for outbreaks of common sense among the people. There would be new shrieks of "fiat money", "paper money", and "greenbackism", and the rest of it—the same old cries with which the people have been shouted down from the beginning.

I think we are getting a sound idea on the money question. The people have an instinct which tells them that something is wrong and that the wrong somehow centers in money. Now, as to paper money, so called; everyone knows that paper money is the money of civilized people. Don't allow them to confuse you with the cry of "paper money."

Now, here is Ford proposing to finance Muscle Shoals by an issue of currency. Very well; let us suppose for a moment that Congress follows his proposal. The required sum is authorized—say, $30,000,000. The bills are issued directly by the Government, as all money ought to be. When the workmen are paid off, they receive these United States bills. When the material is bought, it is paid in these United States bills. They will be the same as any other currency put out by the Government; that is, they will be money. They will be based on the public wealth already in Muscle Shoals; they will be retired by the earnings of the power dam. That is, the people of the United States will have all that they put into Muscle Shoals and all that they can take out for centuries—the endless wealth-making water power of that great Tennessee River—with no tax and no increase of the national debt.

Under the old way, any time we wish to add to the national wealth we are compelled to add to the national debt. Now, that is what Henry Ford wants to prevent. He thinks it is stupid, and so do I, that for the loan of $30,000,000 of their own money the people of the United States should be compelled to pay $66,000,000—that is what it amounts to with interest. People who will not turn a shovelful of dirt nor contribute a pound of material will collect more money from the United States than will the people who supply the material and do the work. That is the terrible thing about interest. In all our great bond issues the interest is always greater than the principal. All of the great public works cost more than twice the actual cost on that account. Under the present system of doing business we simply add 120 to 150 percent to the stated cost.

But here is the point: If our Nation can issue a dollar bond, it can issue a dollar bill. The element that makes the bond good makes the bill good also. The difference between the bond and the bill is that the bond lets the money brokers collect twice the amount of the bond and an additional 20 percent, whereas the currency pays nobody but those who directly contribute to Muscle Shoals in some useful way.

If the Government issues bonds, it simply induces the money brokers to draw $30,000,000 out of the other channels of trade and turn it into Muscle Shoals; if the Government issues currency, it provides itself with enough money to increase the national wealth at Muscle Shoals without disturbing the business of the country. And in doing this it increases its income without adding a penny to its debt.

It is absurd to say that our country can issue $30,000,000 in bonds and not $30,000,000 in currency. Both are promises to pay; but one promise fattens the usurer, and the other helps the people. If the currency issued by the Government were no good, then the bonds issued would be no good either. It is a terrible situation when the Government, to increase the national wealth, must go into debt and submit to ruinous interest charges at the hands of men who control the fictitious values of gold.

Look at it another way. If the Government issue bonds, the brokers will sell them. The bonds will be negotiable; they will be considered as gilt-edged paper. Why? Because the Government is behind them. But who is behind the Government? The people. Therefore it is the people who constitute the basis of Government credit. Why, then, cannot the people have the benefit of their own gilt-edged credit by receiving non-interest-bearing currency on Muscle Shoals instead of the bankers receiving the benefit of the people's credit in interest-bearing bonds?

The people must pay anyway; why should they be compelled to pay twice, as the bond system compels them to pay? The people of the United States always accept their Government's currency. If the United States Government will adopt this policy of increasing its national wealth without contributing to the interest collector—for the whole national debt is made up on interest charges—then you will see an era of progress and prosperity in this country, such as could never have come otherwise.

I have not copied Mr. Edison's statement in full, but the words here given set forth very clearly the powers of government in regard to issuing money instead of issuing interest-bearing bonds.

No one will be injured by taking control of the money policy away from the few malicious manipulators; but all classes of business, including the farmers, merchants, banks, manufacturies, and others, will be greatly aided.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, American citizens are not particularly interested in academic discussions of money and its metallic base. They are interested in finding a way leading to economic recovery. During the past year they have heard many professional and amateur authorities, by radio and otherwise, tell them that economic recovery can be effected by tinkering with money. Devaluation, silver, commodity dollars, paper dollars, managed currency—all the old schools of thought on money have been brought out of hiding, polished up, and presented to the people by their earnest and sometimes emotional adherents.

Our people are therefore tremendously interested in the significance of the administration's new money bill, which is now under consideration and which is about to become a law. This bill means one thing definitely: That Professor Warren has the ear of the White House and that the President has decided to give at least a partial trial to the professor's theories of money and commodity prices. True, he has not closed the door entirely, but can in the future either adopt Warren's theory of a managed currency or definitely stabilize the dollar.

The President has long ago accepted the theory that higher commodity prices are necessary to restore prosperity. Now he has definitely decided to seek those higher prices through devaluing the gold dollar. This is directly in line with Warren's theory that commodity prices vary in direct proportion to the price of gold; that if you cut the gold content of the dollar in two—thereby doubling the dollar price of gold—commodity prices must rise in proportion.

The President has decided to follow the professor's theories and cut the gold content of the dollar somewhere between 40 and 50 percent. He already has authority to do this, but asks that his authority be confirmed by Congress. If he cuts the dollar 50 percent, then it will hereafter contain 11.61 grains of gold, instead of 23.22 grains as at present.

He takes this step with what is apparently the consent and mandate of the great majority of our people. Millions of people, from bootblacks to financiers, have suddenly become moneywise, and claim to see in devaluing the gold dollar a certain way out of the depression. I, myself, have received hundreds upon hundreds of letters and telegrams expressing the belief that this action will prove a certain remedy for our economic ills.

Will the plan succeed? Professor Warren claims two results will be accomplished:

First. Devaluation will raise commodity prices.

Second. Higher commodity prices will bring economic recovery.

Unless lowering of the gold content of the dollar accomplishes these two purposes, then the professor's theory fails.

I. WILL DEVALUATION RAISE COMMODITY PRICES?

In the long run it cannot help but do so. If the value of a dollar—in gold—is reduced from 100 cents to 50 cents; in other words, if your dollars become half dollars, naturally, their buying power will be lowered. You will need more dollars to buy the same commodity units than you did before devaluation. Prices will go up. But if we devalue 50 percent, will commodity prices double? If the money value of gold is doubled—$2 for $1—will commodity prices also double? Many authorities on money doubt it. Assuming that these authorities are wrong, I doubt very much if the professor's theories will work out exactly in practice. I believe the effect will be slow; prices will rise slowly over a period of years, not over a period of months.

Then, again, when we once stabilize, we shall have trouble keeping the dollar down. The mere lowering of the gold content of the dollar from 22 plus to 11 plus grains of gold—one half—will not maintain the exchange value of the dollar at 50 cents. The credit, wealth, and resources of the United States are so great that the dollar will advance in exchange value in spite of the fact that it contains only one half as much gold as previously. This was demonstrated during the past week when, according to Warren's theory and the Government price of gold, the dollar should have been worth 60 cents, but its exchange value rose to more than 62 cents. A few days ago the Government spent $5,000,000 in the buying of British gold, but could not hammer down the dollar below 62 cents.

If the President definitely stabilizes, say at 50 cents, I believe the dollar will start bouncing back, and if not supported, go to 65 cents, 70 cents, and even higher. Confidence in the dollar will overcome, in part, the theoretical devaluation of 50 percent.

But prices will go up. Perhaps not as fast nor as far as Professor Warren contends, but that they will go up is certain.

II. WE NOW COME TO THE SECOND QUESTION: WILL HIGHER COMMODITY PRICES TEND TO LESSEN THE DEPRESSION AND BE A BASIS FOR ECONOMIC PROSPERITY?

Again there is a strong difference of opinion. Warren says, yes. Others say, no, and that we can build prosperity on a low-price level as well as or better than on a high-price level. These critics say that economic activity cannot be brought about by controlling the metallic base of currency alone, and that many other factors enter into the determination of economic conditions; that credit depends not as much on the metallic base as on the velocity of currency, turn-over, and above all, confidence. That confidence is necessary, all will agree. Without it, no theory will work and we will face certain disaster.

Certainly a higher price level should have one result. It should ease the debt burden. How greatly, depends on how closely higher wages and higher purchasing power keep pace with higher prices. If wages do not rise, the whole scheme fails.

There are other factors of this money bill which are of very great importance. But that they will remain in the bill, or what form they will take after the Senate has finished its consideration, is not certain. What is certain, however, is at least a 60-cent and possibly a 50-cent dollar.

This money experiment will be watched with interest over all the world. For the sake of the American people, let us hope that Professor Warren is right. If he is mistaken, then the President will have to look for a new professor. If he is right, then he will go down in history as a money genius.

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Speaker, the pending bill provides for a fundamental and radical change in the monetary policy of our country and is the most far-reaching and momentous financial measure that has come before this House in half a century.

This bill is intended to carry out the President's monetary program, which is another of the administration's remedies designed to cure our industry ills and is in a way experimental. I say this legislation is experimental, for authorities do not all agree as to the necessity for and the result that may follow this legislation.

Of course, if Congress was to wait for the experts to agree before it would dare to legislate on a financial or monetary problem, there never would be any legislation.

However, it is a fair statement to make that the weight of authority both in this country and of the world is in favor of the principal thing to be accomplished by this legislation—that is, the cutting down of the gold content of the dollar—although there may not be such unanimity as to just how far to go in the cutting-down process.

The pending bill has three vital provisions affecting our monetary program.

First. When this bill becomes a law, if it is passed in its present form, the President will have the power to devalue the gold dollar to a point from 40 percent to 50 percent of its present gold content.

The special session of Congress gave the President power to devalue the gold dollar to 50 percent of its present gold content. The President claims, however, that under such authority he could not devalue the dollar at all unless he made a 50-percent devaluation, and he further contends that his investigation and study of the dollar-devaluation problem has led him to believe that at the present time the devaluation should not exceed 40 percent.

The President is in favor of a world agreement on money standards, but the world, particularly England, is not yet ready to agree upon any international monetary standard, and there is no assurance as to what time England and the rest of the world will be ready to enter into any international agreement on monetary problems. Apparently if we are to have any devaluation of the gold dollar at this time, we must go it alone. The President believes that the safe place to start is to take out of the gold dollar 40 percent of its present gold content. Now, when the gold dollar is devalued as provided for in this bill, there will be just as many pennies, nickels, dimes, quarters, and half dollars in the dollar as there are at the present time. The only expected change to occur is that the purchasing power of these various coins will probably be less than it is at the present time.

The whole excuse for this legislation is the belief on the part of its advocates that there is a scarcity of gold in the world; that that scarcity has resulted in increasing the purchasing power contained in our dollar, and the consequent falling of commodity prices, because the more valuable the gold in the dollar is, the more the dollar will buy of commodities, and that the way to bring about a higher price for commodities is to reduce the amount of gold in the dollar, thereby requiring more dollars to buy a given article.

Under the President's monetary program there will be no future coinage of money. The metallic money of the country will be retained in bullion in the United States Treasury and gold certificates will circulate as money, as representatives of the gold.

The Constitution gives to Congress the power to coin money and fix the value thereof. Heretofore Congress has exercised this right, but it has never paid much attention to the problem of controlling prices, or attempting to control prices, by changing the metallic content of its money units.

Most people have an idea that the dollar has a set purchasing power and that it is a fixed standard of measure, like the yard and the foot, but such is not the case.

Our gold dollar has had a variable purchasing power. From 1902 to 1920 the purchasing power of the gold dollar fell off two thirds, while from 1929 to last March it rose about 100 percent as to farm products and about 75 percent as regards other commodities. Now, the purpose of the President's program is to control this fluctuation in the purchasing power of the dollar, by decreasing the gold content of the dollar when prices are too low and increasing the gold content of the dollar when prices get too high. In other words, to give the country a kind of a managed currency.

What prices will the Government follow in making these changes? Not prices of individual commodities as wheat or cotton but the average price level of seven-hundred-odd commodities, as tabulated by the Labor Bureau at Washington. While certain commodities are liable to vary in price because of overproduction or underproduction of these articles, it is contended that the average price of seven-hundred-odd commodities is a safe and sound test of the increasing or decreasing purchasing power of our units of value.

Second. This bill provides that all our monetary gold shall be impounded in the United States Treasury and become the property of the United States Government, with the result that all the profits from devaluing the dollar will go to the Government and not to individuals.

Practically all the gold in this country, outside of the gold held by the Federal Reserve banks, has already been turned into the United States Treasury under an Executive order issued by the President several months ago. Under that order about $700,000,000 were turned into the United States Treasury, and it is stated that the Federal Reserve banks have about $3,500,000,000 at the present time.

The complaint is made that neither in equity nor in law has Congress or the President any right to compel the Federal Reserve banks to turn over their gold to the United States Treasury. The Federal Reserve Board agrees with the President that the profit on the gold holdings of the Federal Reserve banks should go to the United States Government, but they want to retain the gold as backing for their note issues.

If this bill should provide that the Federal Reserve banks should keep their gold and have the profits resulting from the devaluation of the gold dollar, then there would be nothing left for Congress and the President to do but to restore to the citizens of our country the $700,000,000 taken from them under an Executive order issued several months ago.

If all the gold in the country is restored to the United States Treasury and the devaluation plan of the President goes through, it will mean a profit to the United States Treasury of about $3,000,000,000, and the Treasury would then have a gold reserve of about $7,000,000,000.

Third. This bill further provides that a stabilization fund of $2,000,000,000, part of the profits of the devaluing process, be set apart in the Treasury as a stabilization fund, to be used by the Secretary of the Treasury for stabilizing international exchange and United States securities through the purchase by the Treasury of gold, foreign currencies, and securities of the United States Government.

This provision of the pending bill follows a stabilization plan set up by England after that country left the gold standard about 3 years ago. The plan has worked very satisfactorily in England and it has been deemed necessary that the United States follow a similar program in protecting its exporters from undue fluctuations in foreign exchange and also for protecting United States securities.

Whether or not this provision of the pending bill lodges too much authority with the Secretary of Treasury I am not prepared to affirm or deny; but, in view of the fact of the divided judgment of the Federal Reserve Board as to policies in the past, it would appear that it might not be a bad idea to make a trial of a one-man board in the handling of our stabilization program. If the plan does not work out satisfactorily, future Congresses can create a board made up of the Secretary of Treasury, a representative of the Federal Reserve bank, a representative of the manufacturing interests of the country and of agriculture to handle the problems confided to the Secretary of Treasury alone in this bill.

Mr. Speaker, I am for this bill; I think it is a step in the right direction along the road to the stabilization of the purchasing power of our dollar. Our country and the world are in the most serious industrial crisis known in all history; and if we are ever to get out of this depression and save our industrial democracy, we must have the courage and statesmanship to launch a new monetary program, even though it may be deemed extraordinary and radical.

Our country is crushed under a debt burden of $200,000,000,000 today—private, corporate, and governmental—and we also have a crushing tax burden of about $13,000,000,000 a year for all our agencies of government. These debts and taxes cannot be paid unless the purchasing power of the dollar is brought down and made more in accord with the purchasing power of the dollar when these huge debts were contracted; and the main object and purpose of this legislation is to bring about such a situation.

The recovery program of the present administration has helped to bring prices of manufactured products to higher levels, but agriculture in particular has not reaped any like benefits.

The prices of many basic farm products are below the cost of production. In fact, the prices received by the farmers for certain of their products, such as butter, eggs, lard, cheese, and meats, are the lowest in generations.

Agriculture is our basic industry, and there can be no return of prosperity in this country until that industry is put on a paying basis.

It is believed that the cutting down of the dollar to 60 percent of its present content will have a tendency to increase our money gold base, to cheapen its purchasing power, and thereby bring to agriculture higher prices and a prosperity that is essential in the successful working out of any plan for industrial recovery.

Mr. LEMKE. Mr. Speaker, history repeats itself. Croesus of old, fable tells us, hoarded all the gold and finally ended by having molten gold poured down his throat, and in spite of his agony the people rejoiced. The Federal Reserve banks, in their greed, grabbed and stole virtually all the gold in this Nation, and now the people in their might and in their desperation, through their Government, reach out and take it away from them for the good of the Nation. The people hope for the best. No objection is heard except here and there the wailing of a lonely wolf—the dying echoes of the shadow of a past civilization—the international banker. Time and time alone will take care of him. Alas, his power of frightening the people into hysteria with the shout of fiat money confiscation, debasing the currency, and soft money is gone forever. No one listens to his wailing.

The Members of Congress and the people of this Nation who favor an intelligent expansion of the currency, enthusiastically accept this first step in the President's new monetary policy, but they realize that the mere seizing of the monetary gold of this Nation by the Government, and increasing its value by lowering the gold content in the dollar, while it will make several billion profit for the Government, will not in itself help agriculture or industry unless the medium of exchange, the money in circulation, is also increased. Lowering the gold content in a dollar, making gold dearer, will bring about further deflation and further hardships unless it is followed by a corresponding increase in the medium of exchange—of money in the hands of the people.

The mere revaluing of gold—making gold dearer and thereby making money that is in our possession—silver and paper—cheaper by 40 percent, will not expand the currency, but on the contrary, contract it. More than the revaluing of gold must be done before this Nation can or will prosper. The underlying idea of the revaluation of gold is that when gold is made dearer, commodity prices will go up in comparison with the cheapened money—silver and paper—which, of course, is the only money we have, the Federal Reserve banks and the United States Treasury having heretofore practically cornered the monetary gold. We must not permit ourselves to be misled and fooled by superficial thinkers—book-educated, over-scholastic economists—that increasing or doubling the value of gold can in any way help the great mass of people when the gold is all in the hands of the Federal Reserve banks and the Treasury. It is at best simply the first step in the right direction. The final step must be an expansion of the currency—an increase of the purchasing power—in the hands of the people.

It must be clear to all that when the Government seizes all the gold and then lowers the gold content in a dollar by 40 percent that it will have 40 percent more gold with which to make dollars, and, therefore, the Government will have more dollars by 40 percent. It must also be equally clear to us that since we have no gold that by the mere revaluing of gold, if nothing further is done, our purchasing power is not increased but decreased. In other words, no extra dollars are put into the people's pockets. Therefore, in order to make the President's monetary policy a success, he must take a second step and expand the currency in the hands of the people. He must by some method increase the money in our possession by 40 percent. Unless that is done there will be a colossal failure; there must be a controlled and intelligent expansion of the currency in the hands of the people if we are to put an end to this depression and a disguised dole system.

I believe that a large majority of the Members of Congress, if allowed a free expression, free from party politics and party leadership and seniority rights, favor an honest and intelligent expansion of the currency and are in favor of the Frazier-Lemke bill, the refinancing of the farmers by issuing Federal Reserve notes, thereby expanding the money in the people's hands by something over $2,000,000,000. I am confident that in addition they would favor the Patman bill, paying the soldiers' bonus by issuing Treasury notes and thereby expanding the currency another $2,000,000,000. If this were done the buying power of the people would be increased by $4,000,000,000 and it would be in accordance with the President's first step in his monetary policy. What we must have is more purchasing power, not less; more money, not less.

If Congress had the foresight and the courage to use this gold that the Government is about to seize, use the revalued gold dollar as a basis for increasing the money in actual circulation by $4,000,000,000 by passing the Frazier-Lemke bill and the Patman bill, then there will be no further need of issuing further tax-exempt interest-bearing bonds, and this Nation will rejoice because there will then again be plenty of money in actual circulation with which to do the Nation's business. It will be an intelligent expansion of the currency and not inflation.

We have heard a great deal about honest debts, but very little about the dishonest dollars with which we are expected to pay these debts. I mean the dishonest gold dollar—the rubber dollar, the value of which, the purchasing power of which, the Wall Street bankers had the power to expand or contract at will. In the spring of 1917, No. 1 Dark Northern wheat sold as high as $3.89 a bushel in Minneapolis. One thousand bushels of wheat at that time bought $3,890—gold dollars—it paid an indebtedness at that time of $3,890. By October 1932 these bankers had stretched the value of that gold dollar so that it took 19,000 bushels to buy the same $3,890 that 1,000 bushels bought in 1917. They had expanded, stretched the value of the dollar to 19 times its purchasing power in comparison with the purchasing power of wheat, and what was true of wheat was true of other farm commodities.

Such a dollar is not an honest dollar. Such a monetary system is corroded and corrupt. It has outlived its usefulness. It has grown senile with age. What this Nation needs and wants is a monetary system based on the average price level of the principal commercial commodities and not on one or two commodities, least of all upon the gold commodity. When we get that system, then the debtor will be able to pay his debts with an honest dollar of approximately the same value when pay day comes as it was when the obligation was contracted.

Let Congress give to this Nation the Frazier-Lemke bill and the Patman bill as emergency measures. As a permanent remedy, let Congress pass H.R. 3834, a bill creating the Bank of the United States, owned by the Government of the United States, operated and controlled by a board of directors consisting of one director from each State. That would give us a national currency, and not a currency manipulated by Wall Street. Give to that bank the control of the money and the credit of the Nation; let it take up all of the tax-exempt interest-bearing outstanding bonds; let it supply us with ample units of exchange with which to measure the muscular and brain energy of our people; and then we will never again find a condition where millions are hungry in the midst of plenty, where everything is to be done and nothing being done, because we have not a sufficient medium of exchange, not sufficient money to do the Nation's business.

I am sorry that the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures attached a provision to the bill to revaluate the gold content of the dollar appropriating $2,000,000,000 to the Secretary of the Treasury with which to deal in gold and foreign exchange and such other instruments and securities as he deems necessary to stabilize the exchange value of the dollar. With that provision I am not in accord. I had thought that we had gotten enough of this class of securities during the Hoover administration, when, under the theory to increase the buying power of foreign exchange, Krueger and the international bankers were encouraged to unload on our unsuspecting public billions of questionable foreign bonds and securities.

I am confident that if the Secretary of the Treasury attempts to gamble in foreign exchange and securities that the result will be that the Government of the United States will have on its hands several billion more of worthless foreign bonds and securities. I do not believe that the Secretary of the Treasury can enter that game with the European gamblers and manipulators and come out victorious. Anyway, it is not an honorable or legitimate game—in our courts gaming contracts are held void.

Even if in these market manipulations the Secretary of the Tresaury should be successful, how would he collect from our European friends who already have refused to pay us what they legitimately owe? My advice to the Secretary of the Treasury is to stay at home. If our Government must gamble, let it gamble with its own people. I am afraid we are getting altogether too internationally minded. Let us get an honest monetary system—an honest dollar with which we can correctly measure the things produced by the energy of our people, and then we need not worry about its exchange value in foreign countries—that will take care of itself.

Mr. KRAMER. Mr. Speaker, I am fully in accord with the President's monetary program and his proposed cure for the depression, and I believe he should have the fullest cooperation of each and every Member of the House. While we are still passing through the most perilous depression in history—and at this very moment it is more serious than most of us realize—we are definitely on the upward trend, but it will take the combined cooperation of all of us to make our President's program the success we all want it to be.

The monetary problem is undoubtedly the most important piece of legislation we have before us today, and in all probability the most important we will have to contend with during the present session of Congress. Our Government has been suffering for many years on account of the single gold standard; and I am firmly of the opinion that by reducing the content of gold in the dollar, we will be helping in a material way to improve conditions in this country.

The present monetary program provides that all the gold bullion now owned by the Federal Reserve banks, or by any individual, shall be melted into bars and placed in our Treasury in order that our Government may have control over it at all times. Thirty-two nations of the world have already gone off the gold standard, and I am sure that we can work out some way which will be satisfactory to all concerned in the matter of our gold standard. The Gold Reserve Act of 1934 is intended to protect our currency system and to provide for the better use of the gold stock. I am in favor of this act and will give it my unqualified support.

It is most important that the stabilization of our dollar be decided upon as quickly as possible, as recovery of industry depends largely upon this stabilization. We must weigh this subject seriously; arguments on all sides must be considered with greatest interest, as the future of our Nation depends upon our action at this time.

The message received by Congress on January 15 was one of the most important messages received, as it dealt with a law which will invest in the Government of the United States the title to and possession of all monetary gold within the United States. This measure is a very courageous attempt to break away from the so-called "money changers." It upsets the inflexible beliefs and precepts of that nearly discredited section of our population. These "money changers" were merely traders upon the credulity of the American people. We were led to believe that these men who stood upon financial eminence deserved our respect, but in reality their eminence was a mere sham.

NAZI PROPAGANDA

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting three radio addresses by the gentleman from New York [Mr. DICKSTEIN].

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The addresses are as follows:

RADIO ADDRESS OF HON. SAMUEL DICKSTEIN, OCTOBER 17, 1933

My proposed investigation of the ramifications of Nazi propaganda in the United States will concern itself primarily with one feature of the propaganda.

I am not interested in the manner in which the present-day German Government seeks to conduct its own affairs in its country. If the German people have no objection to being enslaved and made into an unthinking mass following Hitler, and blindly obeying his goose-stepping leadership, it is their own privilege. We are not in a position to, nor do we intend, to tell the German people what to do with their own affairs and how to conduct their own government.

Nor do we intend at this time to protest against any brutality and inhumanity which that government has been guilty of toward its own subjects much as our hearts may bleed for these victims of tyranny and oppression. We cannot help them except by joining with other nations in alleviating the distress of these victims and in helping them to reestablish their lives on a humane basis.

But our resolve not to concern ourselves with the internal affairs of Germany cannot blind us to the fact that here in America an insidious, well-planned, and well-financed Hitler propaganda is rapidly taking root. They have already established an official newspaper—they are importing and flooding sections of the country with booklets, pamphlets, and leaflets—they are holding public meetings in public halls—they are actually drilling their storm troops on American soil. So that we, as Americans, are compelled as a matter of self-defense to put a definite end to this intolerable propaganda. By getting hold of the movement before it becomes uncontrollable, we might be able to nip in the bud all these attempts which eventually tend to only one goal—and that is the overthrow of our cherished form of democracy and the establishment on our soil of a Nazi dictatorship.

I do not want our people to be deceived as to the scope of the Hitler movement. Do not be deluded by utterances coming from official German sources which seek to make it appear as though this movement were confined to Germany. I understand that 40,000,000 marks have been laid aside by Hitler for foreign propaganda purposes, and there is Hitler internationale, which operates in many countries of the world, and which seeks to convert all people of German blood or descent to the philosophy of Hitler.

A few days ago I had occasion to brand in the public press as incorrect the statement made by the German Ambassador in the United States, who said in effect that the German Government is not interested in the philosophy of the governments of other countries. I pointed out then, and I am repeating it now, that the Government of Germany is seeking to spread its tentacles into each highway and byway where people of German blood may live. In fact, at a recent meeting of the League of Nations the British delegate, Mr. Ormsby-Gore, criticized very severely this Nazi policy of interference, pointing out that if the British Empire were to follow out this policy, every descendant of the Mayflower living in the United States would be subject to British supervision, which Mr. Ormsby-Gore said was "preposterous to contemplate."

But the German Government has no hesitancy in sending its emissaries and agents to Austria, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Rumania, Holland, Denmark, Poland, and even Southwest Africa; in fact, every country where people of German blood or descent may live.

I have before me an official pamphlet of the Nazi organization in the United States which shows they are seeking to take into this fighting organization every German in the United States, whether alien or naturalized citizen—even native-born Americans of German extraction are not beyond the scope of their desires.

In short, the Nazis seek to create a government within a government. There is an alien group in this country acting as such and thinking as such, whose objective can be nothing else than the overthrow of our own Government and the substitution in its place of a dictatorship.

It is against this insidious and wicked propaganda so subversive to our Government that the investigation conducted by my committee will be directed.

The initial part of this investigation will concern itself with that phase of the situation which may be properly said to come within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization of the House of Representatives. That being a study of the unnaturalized aliens from Germany who are unlawfully in the United States, also a study of the aliens from Germany who are temporarily in the United States as visitors, for business or pleasure, or as students, but who have shown evidence of violation of our immigration law by abusing the courtesy they enjoy as visitors by spreading insidious propaganda of German origin directed against our form of government.

I can assure the public that the investigation to be conducted by the committee will be fair and impartial. The committee will endeavor to obtain proper information as to the manner in which aliens have been entering this country illegally for the purpose of conducting this propaganda. The committee will endeavor to deal fairly with aliens from Germany who have been admitted to this country for the purpose of study, as tourists, or as visitors generally, but will endeavor to secure information as to how these German aliens have been conducting themselves since their admission.

The American Government and the American people will never tolerate any condition whereby aliens enter this country under the guise of visitors or tourists or students, or in any other status under our immigration laws, and then violate the hospitality of our country by engaging in nefarious propaganda. The sooner they leave the country so much healthier will it be here even if we have to deport them.

Would the German Government permit our nationals to trespass on internal affairs in Germany? Would they permit there the same things their nationals have been doing under our noses in the United States since the Hitler form of government has been imposed? By all means, no! Any American engaging in similar propaganda in Germany would find himself in jail, and then more than likely deported. Germany cannot expect our country to permit its nationals to do here what Germany would not tolerate by our citizens there.

It is significant that this organized propaganda is not an amateurish attempt at a peaceful conversion of our American public to the Hitler manner of thinking; on the contrary, the movement is directed by paid German professional Nazi propagandists, well financed and well organized, and is in operation in 14 States in the Union, in the Dominion of Canada, and the Lord knows how many other places adjacent to American land. This fact has already been established and is not guesswork. Does that look like a friendly act of aliens?

Americans have resented and will resent this intolerable attempt to disrupt our political unity and life. Riots have taken place, notably in New York City, and last night in Newark, and the time has come to clear the atmosphere through the cooperation of the American public with this committee. In the conduct of this impartial investigation I appeal to the American people for the fullest cooperation and assistance to the end that Nazi propaganda in the United States will be destroyed.

RADIO ADDRESS OF HON. SAMUEL DICKSTEIN, OCTOBER 28, 1933

On October 15, 1933, there appeared in the American Deutsche Post, which concededly is the official organ of the Nazi government published in the United States, a so-called "open letter" to me in which I was requested, among other things, in the spirit of fair play, to permit persons who believe in the philosophy of Nazi-ism, to appear before the congressional committee, of which I am the chairman, and present their side of the controversy to the American public.

Since this letter is an open one and addressed to me I shall likewise make my answer to that openly, and so that the American public may know both sides of the controversy I am now giving you the official position which the congressional committee will take in this matter.

I wish to assure all and sundry that the congressional committee will be fair to everybody concerned, and if one had access to some of my personal files one would immediately discover that in the many instances where offers of testimony were made to me by adherents of the Nazi Party I promptly assured the individuals in question that every facility would be accorded them to express their views before the congressional committee.

Fair play has forever been an American characteristic, and we shall not forbid or prevent any person who has ideas of his own, whether or not they are in accord with the public opinion of this country, to express their views to my committee. In connection therewith permit me to quote to you that famous statement made by Voltaire, in which he said:

"I disagree with everything you have to say, but I will fight anyone who will prevent you from expressing your views."

In this spirit the congressional committee which will investigate the activities of Nazi-ism in the United States will undertake its task, and no one will be prevented from expressing their views, even though these facts are clearly contrary to American philosophy and statesmanship.

But in permitting prospective witnesses before the committee to express their views, that right is subject to two very important limitations. In the first place, we will permit a citizen of the United States, whether born here or naturalized, to have such opinions on matters of government as he sees fit, but this privilege which we accord to our citizens we do not accord to aliens, and any alien coming to the United States as a guest of the Nation must accept our philosophy of government and must comply with our laws and our scheme of government if he wishes to continue in this country.

Now let me address myself for a moment to Mr. Frederick Heiss, the editor of the paper and the person who signed this open letter to me: You have a great deal to say in your letter about the menace of communism, but the menace of communism is no less than the menace of fascism, particularly of the type permitted by the gentleman you admire so much, Adolf Hitler, of Germany. As an American I can see but little difference in the manner in which communism or facism or any other ism is sending its fangs into the rights of this country. All of these isms are based on the theory that people are not capable of self-government, and that a dictatorship is necessary to set the people right. Personally, I can see no distinction between communism and fascism when it comes to their practical philosophy of curtailing the rights of the people. It seems to me that a distinction between them, although the two might fight each other strenuously, is merely that as between tweedle-dum and tweedle-dee. Both movements are essentially undemocratic and in clear contradiction to that part of the Constitution of the United States which guarantees to every State a republican form of government and guarantees to the Nation freedom of speech, freedom of the press, freedom of assembly, and freedom of elections. Both communism, Hitlerism, fascism, and other isms have made it a definite plank in their programs to prevent the free exercise of the right to vote. They have suppressed freedom of speech, freedom of press, and freedom of assembly. So that no matter how liberal we may be and how much right we will accord to those not in sympathy with the American institutions to speak before the committee, we will not permit any alien to express any views contrary to our national policy, and any person who is here as a guest and who shall violate the hospitality this Nation affords him by advocating an overthrow of those cherished institutions for which this country has stood for 150 years and longer, will find himself promptly and efficiently removed from the country.

As for the expression contained in the paper and in which you state that you see in the philosophy of fascism the highest human ideals, leading toward a better future for all humanity, rest assured that the congressional committee will be apprised of that fact, and permitted to draw such conclusions therefrom as are proper.

It is obvious that the writer of this open letter believes in fascism. Anyone acquainted with the philosophy of fascism knows that it essentially denies that democratic institutions have a right to survive. This is so clearly in contrast with the teachings of the Constitution of the United States that the mere belief in fascism is a negation of all our own Constitution stands for; and yet the author of this letter bluntly states that he sees in that philosophy the highest human ideals leading toward a better state for all humanity. Does this not show that American ideals are not the highest human ideals, in the opinion of the writer of this letter?

The writer speaks a great deal about communistic propaganda, and I agree with him that this propaganda has no place in our Government. Unquestionably communistic propaganda is vicious, and my committee has so investigated it, and there is a 5-volume report ready for Mr. Heiss, if he just wishes to peruse it.

So far as the proposed investigation is concerned, it will deal with the propaganda which we found so obnoxious in the case of communism. Not only is communism a menace, but so is fascism, particularly of the type preached by the national socialists with the addition of racial hatred and bigotry.

If there was any doubt up to the present time of the fact that the Nazi movement was indulging in vicious propaganda in this country, any such doubts must have been dispelled by what transpired in this city a few days ago.

The Germans of New York were seeking to hold their annual celebration known as "German Day", and for that purpose hired the hall of the Sixty-ninth Regiment Armory. Among the speakers scheduled to appear on the occasion was the head of the German propagandists in the United States, Heinz Spanknoebel. The mayor of the city of New York ordered this celebration stopped, but before doing so he held a preliminary hearing in the city hall on Tuesday last, at which preliminary hearing Spanknoebel was present. The mayor asked him if he was an alien, and particularly told him that he would have no objection to this celebration, provided no propaganda was indulged in. Spanknoebel had nothing to say, and when the mayor asked him to return the next day with all his alien friends to state their side of the case, Spanknoebel apparently was afraid that he would be deported from the country and failed to appear. Nor did any of his other alien friends appear, and the mayor was obliged to hold the hearings without any of the alien agitators being present.

You undoubtedly remember that Ciceronian phrase, "By keeping silent they confess their guilt." The alien agitators were vociferous enough in the German societies when they succeeded in driving out of their memberships all Jews and opponents of Hitler's regime in Germany.

Magistrate Brandt resigned as President of the societies in disgust. Nor did any of the other directors who were fair-minded enough to conduct the societies on the basis of Americanism and fair play continue in office. Spanknoebel became the voice of the organization and this entire celebration was scheduled not to show the achievements of Germans in the United States, but to make propaganda for the Hitler cause in this country. Apparently the activities of Spanknoebel were objectionable even to his own masters, and it is said that he was recalled, and for all we know he may now be on the high seas fleeing to Germany in fear of deportation proceedings.

I wish it distinctly understood that it is perfectly proper for the Germans in this city or elsewhere to celebrate the arrival of their first immigrants in the United States, and I for one have always sympathized with the efforts of the Germans in this country to celebrate in proper form the achievements of Germans in the field of art, literature, and science, but this year it was not to be a celebration of any achievements, but it was to be a propaganda meeting for the purpose of assailing a branch of our people on the score of bigotry and anti-Semitism. Hitler and his cohorts have by this time learned that New York is not a healthy place for the propaganda of anti-Semitism and bigotry, and if his lieutenants will remember to keep their hands off our American organizations which have been going along peacefully in conducting their own work, it will bring happiness to our people and put an end to mischievous propaganda.

If communism is a thorn in the flesh to hurt our institution and Government, so is Hitlerism—and there is no room in this country for any foreign propaganda. We do not need Mr. Hitler's help to stamp out communism nor the Communists' help to stamp out Hitlerism. This Nation will rid itself by its own efforts from all attempts to undermine its foundations.

RADIO ADDRESS OF HON. SAMUEL DICKSTEIN, DECEMBER 15, 1933

Ladies and gentlemen, during the past 15 years, and particularly during these last 4 years of dark depression, the world has been groping for light. We have been striving to restore a lost social order and to apply the marvels of a recently mechanized universe to the welfare of humanity; to supplant the suffering and utter chaos of that great convulsion of civilization, the World War, with new schemes for the coordination of our resources to our needs.

To do this the various peoples of the earth have experimented with sundry types of government, all of which, it must be said, have been designed with the honest intention of benefiting their own particular groups of subjects to be affected. Russia has chosen communism, Italy fascism; and no government in the world has been left unaffected by the tempest for change which has swept across the entire face of the earth.

One phase of this world revolution in particular has been worthy of our attention—that is, the overthrow of democratic principles and personal liberties; the freedom of the press, liberty of speech; rights of franchise without discrimination as to race, creed, or color; in short, the personal authorities endowed upon us by our Creator have been destroyed or distorted under the iron fists of new rulers in various countries.

Over the tombs of the decadent and almost forgotten Romanoffs, Stalin, the dictator of all the Russian states, has assumed power. His word is law, religion, creed, and absolute fiat to the millions of citizens who constitute the largest state in Europe.

Italy, now a monarchy in name only, genuflects before the sacred image of Benito Mussolini: a man who can create heroes and relegate them immediately to the limbo of forgotten men despite popular sentiment; a man who can control all phases of governmental operations without inviting the opinions of his subjects or, indeed, the approval of his king; a man who can dissipate his cabinet and assume almighty powers over all the Italians and Italy's foreign relations without consulting a single soul.

Pilsudski, the grizzled soldier of Poland, has little less control over that country. Turkey, Rumania, Czechoslovakia, Bulgaria, Yugoslavia, and even Austria with its diminutive Dictator Dollfus—who is small in stature only—have turned into the hands of their rulers power such as even only the sultans of past centuries enjoyed.

Liberal governments, such as the Republic of France and the monarchy of Great Britain, are confronted with the necessity of concentrating their functions in the hands of a few all-powerful leaders. The liberal governments of these two countries find it difficult to defeat their democratic principles against the wave for dictatorial power that has swept from the East to dash the foundations of liberty to bits. These strongholds of popular government, the lone survivors of Europe's upheaval, are being severely tried. Who knows but that in time England and France, hemmed in by neighboring dictatorships, may be forced to resort to some similar form of centralized control of all personal and public functions of their peoples.

The time has come when the United States of America, too, must think seriously of protecting its democracy. Thank God for the 3,000 miles which separate our people from the political problems of bickering European states. But is our geographical position alone enough to keep us from being dragged into the cauldron of European upheavals?

Fully appreciative of the importance of support from this great Nation, appreciative of the strength of our young men, appreciative of our financial and industrial resources, and, above all, appreciative of the tremendous sympathy and gullibility of the American heart, European powers at this moment are using every device known to parliamentarians to inveigle us in their difficulties. Fortunately, bounded by two friendly countries, Canada and Mexico, we know little of the tension that exists in Europe, where a score of nations, penned up in an inadequate continent, are glaring at each other and awaiting the first international incident that may provide tinder for a new conflagration of armed conflicts.

Aliens who come into the United States, men who have had military experience in their own countries, men who have directed armies and navies are particularly dangerous to the welfare of our country. It is these aliens who have been taking advantage of every loophole of our immigration laws to enter these shores and to engage in pernicious propaganda destructive of the fundamentals of our Government and the principles of our Constitution.

Foremost among those who are at present seeking to influence American opinions are the agents of Adolf Hitler, the dictator of Germany. For the last 8 weeks the House of Representatives Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, of which I am chairman, has been investigating the operations of certain German organizations and German individuals in the United States. Although considerably hampered in our investigation by the lack of funds necessary to expose the intricate and deftly covered machinations of the Nazi government, we have succeeded in unearthing evidence to define the Nazi government here as the most dangerous threat to our democracy that has ever existed. Through the good offices of friends of the committee, who have worked with us for none other than patriotic reasons, we are at last getting to the bottom of a foreign political machine whose activities will prove of startling interest to all Americans when the time comes for exposure.

We hope to present sufficient evidence before Congress, when that body reconvenes in January, to make feasible the creation of a special committee, properly financed by the Government, for the uncloaking of all subversive elements connected with the Nazi movement in the United States.

At present our findings indicate beyond a doubt in the minds of those most closely connected with the investigation that Nazi activities are not confined to the mere distribution of literature which might clarify our understanding of the situation in Germany. The German propaganda that has come into our hands is of a pernicious sort, ostensibly designed to gain the sympathy of Americans for Hitler's domestic policies and to influence Americans toward Hitler's claims against foreign nations. German propaganda contains such elements as to bring to a head in this country hatred for one's fellow citizens.

Hitler has enlisted the aid of certain institutions in the United States whose help could be secured by monthly payments. He has transformed into mediums of his propaganda German-American institutions many of which have earned the respect of our citizens through years of splendid service to our needs. Germany's industrial representatives in this country have been coordinated with the diabolical plans of the Hitler government, and I can point to a number of them as direct executors of Hitler's base aims against civilization.

At this moment in New York City, wherein we have the largest concentration of Germans in the country, the social ranks of German-Americans have been divided in two distinct groups. On the one side are the liberal Germans and Jews, who cannot conscientiously subscribe to Herr Hitler's policies of prostituting ideals to the requirements of an ambitious and unscrupulous state. On the other side are thousands of Germans who have been intimidated into bowing to Hitler's dictation. Should they refuse to bend their knees to their fanatical Chancellor, the safety of their friends and relatives residing in Germany would be jeopardized, and they themselves would never dare set foot on the fatherland again. Others of this latter category are influenced by the personal profit offered them for their support of the Hitler government.

From the meager budgets of the third Reich a surprising amount of money is being spent on propaganda in the United States, and at the same time these funds are being swelled by thousands of dollars extorted from German citizens in New York. We know the sources that finance this Nazi movement. We have evidence of the amounts being expended by the Berlin Government and we know the measures being employed to coerce Germans to contribute to this fund for the propagation of hate and unrest. Poor Germans in this country are literally being blackmailed into lending their moral and financial support to the issues of their chancellor.

One of the most surprising features of my fan mail is the support my investigation is receiving from Germans in this country. I have on file scores of letters commending the inquiry and wishing it Godspeed. In every case, however, there is the caution, "Please do not allow this letter to leave your hands; my congratulations here might cost me my livelihood or my health."

Secret agents and spies, a secret police, a smuggling of arms for military drill—in short, activities which were unknown in this country at any time and not indulged in except by enemies of our people have become the order of the day. I know of instances where a secret Nazi police did threaten Americans who happened to have relatives on the other side with dire reprisals if they would not join the movement. I know of instances where, because of the resistance of American citizens to dictation by foreign spies, their relatives in Germany were secretly removed to places unknown. I know of instances where men and women thoroughly American in spirit were obliged to yield to persuasion of foreign spies because of their fear as to what would happen to their relatives in Germany if they did not become active members of the Hitler band in the United States.

Perhaps most important of all is the connection of German agents with a number of revolutionary movements that are expanding in the United States with astounding rapidity. Through the United States mails today, thousands of newspapers, magazines, pamphlets, and letters are being circulated by leaders of various rebellious cliques of this country. They appeal to the jobless and disgruntled elements for support that will put them into power at Washington; they appeal to the bigoted for their help in persecutions of various races and religious sects, and they appeal to the righteous for support in a campaign against imaginary abuses of a thousand and one descriptions.

Our investigation has revealed this much: That a definite connection exists between these organizations and Nazi bodies, who appear to be financing and organizing them; that the leaders of the new movement are cranks of various sorts, whose mentalities, when exposed to investigation, are undoubtedly pathological; that a movement is under way to having these various movements into a united front; and that, in consideration of the response they have received from hundreds of thousands of uninformed Americans and other persons with an unhealthy twist, they present a formidable threat to our democracy.

We are not prepared to join the chorus of "Heil Hitler!" led by a group of militant Hitlerite agents who have succeeded in finding supporters among certain perverted Americans. We shall not barter our democracy for the dictation of groups of fanatics clad in white, silver, khaki, or other colored shirts. We shall not scrap our Constitution and Declaration of Independence and accept as gospel the mysterious dispatches from on high received by one American Fascist leader. Our legislature will never be abandoned for the ouija board.

We do not propose to make the United States a battlefield upon which European nations can settle their disputes. We have purposely moved away from Europe. If we cannot agree on friendly intercourse between America and Europe, entered into with a view toward reciprocal benefit in all dealings, we shall have nothing to do with Europe. We do not attempt to meddle in European affairs; we do not try to disseminate ideas of liberalism and freedom among their fettered subjects; we won't have Europe obstructing our progress.

May I at this time reassert that our investigation is not directed against any groups of Americans who in this country seek to foster the ideals of their ancestors. Such organizations perform a useful function in our social and political life, but I am opposed to aliens with a philosophy of their own dictating to our citizens the form of government which we are to adopt for ourselves.

I am calling upon all Americans whom this message will reach to respect our traditions of democracy, to be on the alert for those dark forces who are operating against us, and to lend us your support in overcoming the most flagrant attack on our civilization that has ever been perpetrated. I refer specifically to German Nazi organizations operating secretly but effectively among us, and to the groups being fostered by the Nazis.

If we do not awaken to the menace of undemocratic enemies, if we do not act at once and in a body, we shall have the utmost difficulty in wiping out our foreign assailants and their secret, disloyal American allies when the time comes for a show-down.

RECLAMATION AS A FEDERAL POLICY

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a letter from the President of the United States to the National Reclamation Association.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a letter from President Franklin D. Roosevelt to Mr. Marshall N. Dana, president of the National Reclamation Association, which was read to that association at the time of its annual meeting in Boise, Idaho, a few days ago. The President's statement is exceedingly interesting and important to the population of one third of the territory of the United States. The National Reclamation Association stands for the N.R.A., and I feel confident that the President's message will be immensely helpful and encouraging throughout the West.

The letter is as follows:

WARM SPRINGS, GA., November 28, 1933.

MR. MARSHALL N. DANA,
President National Reclamation Association,
Boise, Idaho.

MY DEAR MR. DANA: I do not want to let the occasion of the Second Annual Meeting of the National Reclamation Association go by without sending you my greetings and best wishes. May your deliberations result in mutual benefit to Federal water users and the public generally.

Reclamation as a Federal policy has proven its worth and has a very definite place in our economic existence. Spread over one third of the territory of the United States, and creating taxable values and purchasing power affecting municipal, State, and Federal Governments and private industry, it is only reasonable that we should all take pride in its achievements and success.

The National Industrial Recovery Administration, more popularly known as N.R.A., is designed to pull us out of the depression, and that it is accomplishing its purpose is acclaimed everywhere. I hope the fact that your association has the same initials is significant, and that the two may gradually but surely help the farmer to economic independence, with the active cooperation of the administration.

Very sincerely yours, FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

EXECUTIVE ORDERS LIBERALIZING VETERANS' REGULATIONS

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to insert the regulations issued by the President yesterday with reference to veterans.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, under the permission granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I desire to insert the Executive orders of the President of the United States issued January 19, 1934, liberalizing certain provisions of the former veterans' regulations.

The general effects of these new regulations are as follows:

First. Increase in rates of pension for war veterans suffering with service-connected disabilities from $90 to $100 per month for total disability and proportionate increases for such veterans suffering with less than total disabilities.

Second. Liberalization of eligibility rules for hospital treatment in non-service-connected cases so as to provide such treatment to veterans suffering with nonservice diseases requiring emergency or extensive medical and surgical care, who are unable to pay for same.

Third. The granting of a pension of $15 per month to Spanish-American War veterans who served 90 days or more and were honorably discharged, or who, having served less than 90 days, were discharged for disability incurred in line of duty in the service and who are 50-percent or more disabled without regard to the service origin of the condition or the age of the veteran.

Fourth. Increase in burial and funeral allowance for deceased war veterans from $75 to $100.

Fifth. War veterans suffering with permanent and total disabilities not the result of their misconduct, which are not shown to have been incurred in any period of military or naval service, are no longer required to prove a minimum of 90 days' service, providing they were discharged on account of disability incurred in line of duty, in order to draw pension of $30 per month.

Sixth. Restoration of previous rates of pension payable to certain widows of deceased Regular Army officers and enlisted men who died of disabilities incurred in line of duty, the maximum payable in such cases to be the $30 rate payable to widows of war veterans who died of service-connected disabilities.

Seventh. Prohibition against payment of pension to Federal employees receiving salaries in excess of $50 per month was modified to permit the payment of pensions to such employees, if single, whose salary does not exceed $1,000 per annum, or, if married or supporting minor children, does not exceed $2,500 per annum.

Eighth. Provision authorizing renouncement of pension which will permit trained employees of the Veterans' Administration, who, otherwise, under the provisions of the Economy Act would be barred from participating in the making of decisions on veterans' claims, to retain their positions.

The estimated annual cost of these amendments is $21,092,205.

The President's orders are as follows:

EXECUTIVE ORDER—VETERANS' REGULATION NO. 1 (C) ENTITLEMENT TO PENSIONS

By virtue of the authority vested in me under section 1 of title I of the act entitled "An act to maintain the credit of the United States Government", approved March 20, 1933 (Public, No. 2, 73d Cong.), the following regulation amending Veterans' Regulation No. 1 (a) and Veterans' Regulation No. 1 (b) is hereby prescribed:

1. Paragraph II, subparagraphs (a) to (j) of part I of veterans' regulations no. 1 (a) is amended to read as follows:

"(a) If and while the disability is rated 10 percent the monthly pension shall be $10.

"(b) If and while the disability is rated 20 percent the monthly pension shall be $20.

"(c) If and while the disability is rated 30 percent the monthly pension shall be $30.

"(d) If and while the disability is rated 40 percent the monthly pension shall be $40.

"(e) If and while the disability is rated 50 percent the monthly pension shall be $50.

"(f) If and while the disability is rated 60 percent the monthly pension shall be $60.

"(g) If and while the disability is rated 70 percent the monthly pension shall be $70.

"(h) If and while the disability is rated 80 percent the monthly pension shall be $80.

"(i) If and while the disability is rated 90 percent the monthly pension shall be $90.

"(j) If and while the disability is rated as total the monthly pension shall be $100."

2. Part II of Veterans' Regulation No. 1(a) is hereby amended by adding a new paragraph to read as follows:

"IV. The surviving widow of any deceased person who died as a result of injury or disease incurred in or aggravated by active Coast Guard, military, or naval service, in line of duty, who was on March 20, 1933, being paid, except by fraud, mistake, or misrepresentation, a pension under general or service pension laws at a rate in excess of the rate authorized under Veterans' Regulation No. 1(a), part II, paragraph III, shall hereafter until death or remarriage be entitled to be paid a pension at the rate authorized under the prior general law but not more than $30 per month."

3. Paragraph I, subparagraph (a) of part III of Veterans' Regulation No. 1(a) is amended to read as follows:

"(a) Any person who served in the active military or naval service, for a period of 90 days or more, during either the Spanish-Amemrican War, the Boxer rebellion, the Philippine insurrection, or the World War, and who has been honorably discharged therefrom, or who, having served less than 90 days, was discharged for disability incurred in the service in line of duty, who is shown to have been in active service therein before the cessation of hostilities shall be entitled to receive a pension for permanent total disability not the result of his misconduct and which is not shown to have been incurred in any period of military or naval service: Provided, That."

4. Paragraph I, subparagraph (h) of part III of Veterans' Regulation No. 1(a), as amended by Veterans' Regulation No. 1 (b), is amended to read as follows:

"(h) Any veteran of the Spanish-American War, Boxer rebellion, or Philippine insurrection who is 50 percent disabled and who meets the other requirements of part III shall be paid a pension of not less than $15 per month."

5. The amendments contained in this regulation shall be effective as of the date of promulgation.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 19, 1934.

EXECUTIVE ORDER—VETERANS' REGULATION NO. 6 (B)—ELIGIBILITY FOR DOMICILIARY OR HOSPITAL CARE, INCLUDING MEDICAL TREATMENT

By virtue of the authority vested in me under section 6 of title I of the act entitled "An act to maintain the credit of the United States Government", approved March 20, 1933 (Public, No. 2, 73d Cong.), as amended by section 1 of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934, and for other purposes", approved June 16, 1933 (Public, No. 78, 73d Cong.), the following regulation amending Veterans' Regulation No. 6 (a) is hereby prescribed:

1. Paragraph I of Veterans' Regulation No. 6 (a) is amended to read as follows:

"1. The Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, within the limits of Veterans' Administration facilities, is authorized to furnish domiciliary or hospital care, including medical treatment, to the following persons and in the specified order of preference:

"(a) To honorably discharged veterans of any war, including the Boxer rebellion and the Philippine insurrection, who are suffering with injuries or diseases which were incurred or aggravated in line of duty in the active military or naval service when in need of hospital treatment for such injuries or diseases; and

"To those persons included in paragraph III of part I of Veterans' Regulation No. 1 (a) who are suffering with injuries or diseases which were incurred in line of duty when in need of hospital treatment for such injuries or diseases;

"(b) To persons honorably discharged from the United States Army, Navy, Marine Corps, or Coast Guard for disabilities incurred in line of duty who are suffering with injuries or diseases which were incurred or aggravated in line of duty in the active service when in need of hospital treatment for such injuries or diseases;

"(c) To veterans of any war, including the Boxer rebellion and the Philippine insurrection, who served in the active military or naval service for a period of 90 days or more, and who have been honorably discharged therefrom, or who, having served less than 90 days, were discharged for disability incurred in the service in line of duty, who have no adequate means of support, and who are suffering with permanent disabilities or tuberculous or neuropsychiatric ailments, or such other conditions requiring emergency or extensive hospital treatment as may be prescribed by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, which incapacitate them from earning a living;

"(d) To persons honorably discharged from the United States Army, Navy, Marine Corps, or Coast Guard for disabilities incurred in line of duty in the active service, who have no adequate means of support, and who are suffering with permanent disabilities or tuberculous or neuropsychiatric ailments, or such other conditions requiring emergency or extensive hospital treatment as may be prescribed by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, which incapacitate them from earning a living."

2. Paragraph III of Veterans' Regulations No. 6 (a) is amended to read as follows:

"III. Reasonable traveling and other expenses of the person to a Veterans' Administration facility may be paid in the discretion of the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs only when the person is granted prior authority to report to a Veterans' Administration facility for medical treatment or when, in the discretion of the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, transfer from one Veterans' Administration facility to another is deemed advisable. Upon completion of such treatment as may be prescribed and regular discharge by the Veterans' Administration, reasonable traveling and other expenses of the person from the Veterans' Administration facility to the place from which hospitalized may be paid in the discretion of the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs. In the event of the death of any person prior to discharge, transportation expenses (including preparation of the body) for the return of the body to the place of residence or the nearest national cemetery may be paid in the discretion of the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs when deemed necessary and as an administrative necessity."

3. Paragraph VI of Veterans' Regulation No. 6 (a) is amended to read as follows:

"VI. Pension for disability the result of injury or disease incurred or aggravated in the line of duty in the active Coast Guard or military or naval service and emergency officers' retirement pay of any person who is being furnished hospital treatment, institutional or domiciliary care by the United States, or any political subdivision thereof, shall not exceed $15 per month, provided that where such person has a wife, child, or dependent mother or father, so much of the difference by which the amount to which such disabled person would otherwise be entitled exceeds $15 may be paid, in the discretion of the Administrator, to the wife, child, or dependent mother or father in such amounts as he may prescribe. Where any disabled person having neither wife, child, nor dependent mother or father is being maintained by the Government of the United States, or any political subdivision thereof, in an institution and shall be deemed by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs to be insane, the pension or emergency officers' retirement pay for such person shall thereafter not exceed $15 per month so long as he shall be maintained by the Government of the United States, or any political subdivision thereof, in an institution: Provided, however, That in any case where the estate of such person derived from funds paid under the War Risk Insurance Act, as amended; the World War Veterans' Act, 1924, as amended; the Emergency Officers' Retirement Act of May 24, 1928; the several pension acts, Public, No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, or Public, No. 78, Seventy-third Congress, equals or exceeds $1,500, any payments of pension being made will be discontinued until the estate derived from such funds is reduced to $500. The provisions of this paragraph shall also be applicable to pensions for disability the result of injury or disease incurred after active military or naval service, except that the amount payable while the veteran is in the institution shall be $6 per month instead of $15 per month. As to pension payable on account of service prior to the Spanish-American War, the amount payable while the veteran is in the institution shall be $15 per month in all cases."

4. Paragraph VII of Veterans Regulations No. 6 (a) is amended to read as follows:

"VII. Where a disabled person entitled to pension under Public, No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, or Public, No. 78, Seventy-third Congress, or emergency officers' retirement pay is a patient in a Veterans' Administration facility, or where for any other reason the disabled person and his wife are not living together, or where the child or children are not in the custody of the disabled person, or in the custody of the widow, the amount of the pension or emergency officers' retirement pay may be apportioned as may be prescribed by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs."

5. The amendments contained in this regulation shall be effective as of the date of promulgation.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 19, 1934.

EXECUTIVE ORDER—VETERANS' REGULATION NO. 9 (B)—PAYMENT OF BURIAL EXPENSES OF DECEASED WAR VETERANS

By virtue of the authority vested in me under section 17 of title I of the act entitled "An act to maintain the credit of the United States Government", approved March 20, 1933 (Public, No. 2, 73d Cong.), the following regulation amending Veterans' Regulation No. 9 (a) is hereby prescribed:

1. Paragraphs II and III of Veterans' Regulation No. 9 (a) are amended to read as follows:

"II. Where an honorably discharged veteran of any war dies after discharge, the Administrator, in his discretion, and with due regard to the circumstances in each case, shall pay, for burial and funeral expenses and transportation of the body (including preparation of the body) to the place of burial, a sum not exceeding $100 to cover such items and to be paid to such person or persons as may be prescribed by the Administrator. Burial allowance, or any part thereof, authorized under this regulation shall not be payable if the veteran's net assets at the time of death, exclusive of debts and accrued pension, compensation, or insurance due at time of death, equal or exceed the sum of $1,000. The Administrator may, in his discretion, make contracts for burial and funeral services within the limits of the amount herein allowed without regard to the laws prescribing advertisement for proposals for supplies and services for the Veterans' Administration. No deduction shall be made from the sum allowed because of any contribution toward the burial and funeral (including transportation) which shall be made by a State, county, or other political subdivision, lodge, union, fraternal organization, society or beneficial organization, insurance company, workmen's compensation commission, State industrial accident board, or employer, but the aggregate of the sums allowed from all sources shall not exceed the actual cost of the burial and funeral (including transportation).

"III. Where death occurs in a Veterans' Administration facility the Veterans' Administration will (a) assume the actual cost (not to exceed $100) of burial and funeral and (b) transport the body to the place of residence or to the nearest national cemetery, or such other place as the next of kin may direct, where the expense is not greater than the ascertained cost of transportation to place of residence. Where the ascertained cost of transportation to a place directed by the next of kin exceeds the amount allowed in accordance with (b) hereof, such allowable amount shall be available for reimbursement purposes or partial payment in such manner as the Administrator may determine."

2. The change in rate herein provided shall not be applicable in those cases where death occurred prior to date of promulgation of this regulation.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 19, 1934.

EXECUTIVE ORDER—VETERANS' REGULATION NO. 10 (C), MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS

By virtue of the authority vested in me under section 4 of title I of the act entitled "An act to maintain the credit of the United States Government", approved March 20, 1933 (Public, No. 2, 73d Cong.), the following regulation amending Veterans' Regulation No. 10 and Veterans' Regulation No. 10 (b) is hereby prescribed:

1. Paragraph X of Veterans' Regulation No. 10, as amended by Veterans' Regulation No. 10 (b), is amended to read as follows:

"X. No person holding an office or position, appointive or elective, under the United States Government, or the municipal government of the District of Columbia, or under any corporation, the majority of the stock of which is owned by the United States, shall be paid a pension, or emergency officers' retirement pay, so long as he continues to draw a salary from such employment, except (1) those receiving pension or emergency officers' retirement pay for disabilities incurred in combat with an enemy of the United States or for disabilities resulting from an explosion of an instrumentality of war in line of duty during an enlistment or employment as provided in Veterans' Regulation No. 1 (a), part I, paragraph 1; (2) those persons so employed whose pension is protected by the provisions of the act; however, the rate of pension as to this class shall not exceed $6 per month; (3) those unmarried persons whose salary or compensation for service as such employee is in an amount not in excess of $1,000 per annum, computed monthly, or any married person or any person with minor children whose salary or compensation for service as such employee is in an amount not in excess of $2,500 per annum, computed monthly; and (4) widows of veterans."

2. Veterans' Regulation No. 10 is amended by adding a new paragraph to read as follows:

"XXI. Any person entitled to monetary benefits under the provisions of title I, Public, No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, or section 20, Public, No. 78, Seventy-third Congress, may renounce his right thereto. The application renouncing the right shall be in writing over the person's signature, and upon filing of such application payment of monetary benefits and the right thereto shall be terminated and he shall be denied any and all rights thereto from date of receipt of such application by the Veterans' Administration. The renouncement provided for herein shall not preclude the person from filing a new application for pension at a future date, but such application shall have the attributes of an original application and no payment will be made for any period prior to the date thereof."

3. The amendments contained in this regulation shall be effective as of the date of promulgation.

A PROGRAM FOR RELIEF OF VETERANS

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a letter I have received from the American Legion.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Mr. Speaker, on January 10, 1934, at the request of the national legislative committee of the American Legion, I introduced a bill (H.R. 6671) which embodied the "four-point legislative program" of the American Legion.

On January 18, 1934, I received a letter from the national legislative committee of the American Legion asking me to introduce a redraft of my previous bill so as to clarify the measure. Thereafter I introduced a bill known as H.R. 7083.

The letter which I received from the American Legion is as follows:

THE AMERICAN LEGION,
NATIONAL LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE,
ROOM 625, BOND BUILDING,
Washington, D.C., January 18, 1934.

Hon. HENRY ELLENBOGEN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN ELLENBOGEN: Your interest in the Legion's legislative program has been demonstrated by your introduction on January 10 of H.R. 6671, the Legion's four-point bill to fulfill the four-point program for disabled veterans, which was adopted at our Chicago convention in October and which was subsequently placed at the head of our major legislative program by the national executive committee.

Since your introduction of this bill certain misunderstandings have arisen as to whether it actually fulfilled the spirit of our four-point program. And in order to obviate any question in this regard, we have redrafted the bill, and the text of the clarified measure, together with an explanation of its effect and purpose, is hereto attached. I feel confident that the American Legion, Department of Pennsylvania, will appreciate your introducing this redrafted measure as a substitute for the one which you have already introduced.

Please be assured of our appreciation of your interest and cooperation in this matter.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN THOMAS TAYLOR,
Vice Chairman National Legislative Committee.

It is estimated by the American Legion that the bill as redrafted and as introduced by me on January 19 will increase the expenditure of the Government by between sixty-five millions and eighty millions per year. It provides for the enactment by Congress of the four-point program of the Legion, as follows:

First. Restores eligibility for service-connected disability, together with the actual monetary payments received therefor prior to March 20, 1933, with the following exceptions:

(a) Veterans enlisting after the armistice;

(b) Where the Government can prove that disability occurred before or after service; and

(c) Where service connection has been established by fraud, error, or misrepresentation.

The American Legion estimates that the cost for this section would be between $45,000,000 and $60,000,000 per year.

Second. Restores hospitalization privileges, restricted to Veterans' Administration facilities, where a veteran requires hospitalization for a disability and is unable to pay for it.

At the present time many hospital beds in veterans' hospitals are empty. They should be put to use and should be placed at the disposal of the needy veterans. This can be done without request for additional appropriation.

Third. Pensions for widows and orphans in need, at the rate of $15 a month for a widow, $5 a month for the first child, and $3 a month for additional children, on the same conditions and rates provided for the Spanish-American War veterans under the Economy Act.

It is estimated that this will cost about $9,000,000 for the first year and the average cost for 5 years will be $19,250,000.

CONTESTED ELECTION CASE—SANDERS v. KEMP

Mr. KERR, from the Committee on Elections No. 3, reported a resolution in the contested-election case of Sanders v. Kemp in the Sixth Congressional District of Louisiana.

RESIGNATION FROM A COMMITTEE

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication, which was read:

JANUARY 20, 1934.

Hon. HENRY T. RAINEY,
Speaker of House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: I hereby respectfully tender my resignation as a member of the standing committee of the House on Merchant Marine, Radio, and Fisheries.

Respectfully yours,

WILLIAM B. UMSTEAD.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the resignation will be accepted.

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. ELTSE of California, for 5 days, on account of serious illness in his family.

To Mr. CAVICCHIA, on account of illness.

To Mr. GREENWOOD, for 6 days, on account of important official business.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

Mr. PARSONS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the House of the following title, which was thereupon signed by the Speaker:

H.R. 6181. An act to control the manufacture, transportation, possession, and sale of alcoholic beverages in the District of Columbia.

BILL PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT

Mr. PARSONS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee did on this day present to the President, for his approval, a bill of the House of the following title:

H.R. 6181. An act to control the manufacture, transportation, possession, and sale of alcoholic beverages in the District of Columbia.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 7 o'clock p.m.) the House adjourned until Monday, January 22, 1934, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE

MONDAY, JANUARY 22, 1934

(Legislative day of Thursday, Jan. 11, 1934)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed a bill (H.R. 6976) to protect the currency system of the United States, to provide for the better use of the monetary gold stock of the United States, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

REFERENCE AND SIGNING OF BILLS

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair desires to state that, under authority of the order of the Senate on January 11 (calendar day, January 19), 1934, he signed, on January 20, 1934, the enrolled bill (H.R. 6181) to control the manufacture, transportation, possession, and sale of alcoholic beverages in the District of Columbia, which had previously been signed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives and reported by the Committee on Enrolled Bills as being truly enrolled.

The Chair also desires to state that, under further authority of said order, the bill (H.R. 6951) making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, was received by the Secretary on January 20, 1934, from the House of Representatives, and referred on said day by the Chair to the Committee on Appropriations.

GOVERNMENT SALARIES AND VETERANS' LEGISLATION

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I desire to say for the RECORD that I have received in my office so many letters and petitions relating to employees' salaries and veterans' legislation that I find it utterly impossible to make proper reply to them. I wish to make this statement so my constituents may know I am not disregarding their desires.

If it were physically possible every letter would have a personal reply, but we are so flooded with mail that we are simply unable at present to reply by letter. To do so is my sincere desire.

Needless to say I favor the most generous treatment for Government employees and the veterans. I am sure my votes have shown this, and I shall do my best for them.

CALL OF THE ROLL

Mr. LEWIS. I suggest the absence of a quorum and ask for a roll call.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

IMPORTATION OF ALCOHOLIC BEVERAGES (S.DOC. NO. 117)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Director of the Federal Alcohol Control Administration transmitting, in compliance with Senate Resolution No. 127 of the present Congress, information regarding permits to import alcoholic beverages under the marketing agreement and license for the alcoholic beverages importing industry, which, with the accompanying report, was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

REGULATION OF RAILROADS (H.DOC. NO. 223)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission transmitting, pursuant to law, a report of the Federal Coordinator of Transportation on the question, "Is there need for a radical or major change in the organization, conduct, and regulation of the railroad industry which can be accomplished by Federal legislation?", together with four appendixes referred to therein.

Mr. DILL. I move that the report be printed, without the illustrations, and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin memorializing Congress to adopt certain proposed measures for agricultural relief, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

(See resolution printed in full when presented by Mr. LA FOLLETTE on Jan. 19, 1934, p. 916, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.)

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin memorializing Congress to establish uniform rules and regulations for the movement of all commodities in interstate commerce to prevent embargoes, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

(See resolution printed in full when presented today by Mr. DUFFY.)

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin memorializing Congress to enact legislation to provide funds for distribution through the banks of the country to enable industry, particularly the small business man, to make character loans at local banks for a period of 2 years at a rate of interest not to exceed 4 percent, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

(See resolution printed in full when presented today by Mr. DUFFY.)

He also laid before the Senate a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Kentucky, favoring the immediate ratification of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Deep Waterway Treaty with Canada, which was ordered to lie on the table.

(See resolution printed in full when presented today by Mr. LOGAN.)

He also laid before the Senate a resolution of the House of Representatives of the State of Kentucky memorializing Congress to recognize the Federal Government's obligation to share equitably the proceeds of liquor taxes with the States and to prevent intergovernmental competition in such taxation, which was ordered to lie on the table.

(See resolution printed in full when presented today by Mr LOGAN.)

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Montana, which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys:

Senate Joint Memorial 7 (introduced by Duncan and Church)

A memorial memorializing the Congress of the United States for a grant of lands for public buildings at the capitol of the State, in addition to grants heretofore made for that purpose

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives in the Congress of the United States:

Whereas by Senate Joint Memorial No. 6, passed by the Twenty-second session of the Legislative Assembly of the State of Montana, the Congress of the United States was memorialized as follows:

"Whereas the grants of public lands for public buildings at the capitol of the State heretofore made have been found to be insufficient to meet the present needs and requirements; and

"Whereas the Twenty-first Legislative Assembly authorized the issuance of a bond issue of $250,000 for the purpose of erecting and furnishing a suitable Montana State Historical Library as an adjunct to the State Capitol Building; and

"Whereas the State board of examiners have been unable to sell or dispose of said bond issue, owing to the insufficiency of the security guaranteeing said issue; and

"Whereas the security guaranteeing the said issue consists of the land heretofore granted for buildings at the capitol, against which there is outstanding bonds aggregating various amounts which exhausts said security; and

"Whereas there is remaining in the State of Montana approximately 7,000,000 acres of vacant, unappropriated, unreserved, public land: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Senate of the State of Montana (and the house of representatives concurring), That the Congress of the United States be memorialized to grant to the State of Montana 250,000 acres of vacant unappropriated, unreserved public lands within the State of Montana for public buildings at the capitol of the State in addition to the grants heretofore made for that purpose; be it further

"Resolved, That copies of this memorial be forwarded to the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives and each of the Senators and Members of the House of Representatives from Montana in Congress, and to the Secretary of the Interior"; and

Whereas no action was taken by the Congress of the United States on such memorial: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of the State of Montana (and the house of representatives concurring), That said memorial referred to above, heretofore passed in the year 1931, not having been acted upon, request for such grant of lands be hereby respectfully renewed; be it further

Resolved, That copies of this memorial be forwarded to the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States Congress and to the Senators and Representatives in Congress from Montana and to the Secretary of the Interior.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a letter in the nature of a petition of the Army and Navy Journal, of Washington, D.C., praying for the enactment of legislation to restore salaries received by the armed forces of the United States prior to the passage of the so-called "Economy Act" and to provide for pay increases prohibited by said act, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also laid before the Senate a memorial of the substitute clerks' committee of the National Federation of Post Office Clerks, of Des Moines, Iowa, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation that will prevent the restoration of salaries and the filling of vacancies of substitute postal clerks, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the Associated War Veterans of Birmingham, Ala., favoring the care of veterans by the Government out of Federal taxes and the same benefits to be accorded Spanish-American War veterans as Civil War veterans, their widows, and dependents, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by Jack Bernard Camp, United Spanish War Veterans, of Knoxville, Tenn., favoring the taxation of tax-exempt securities, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the Common Council of the city of Wauwatosa, Wis., favoring the continuation of operations under the Civil Works Administration, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the executive board of the Welfare Clients' Association, of Royal Oak Township, Mich., favoring additional relief to families on the welfare rolls of southern Oakland County, Mich., which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also laid before the Senate a memorial of the Governor and State Land Department of Arizona remonstrating against the withdrawal order issued by the Secretary of the Interior of certain Papago Indian lands from mineral entry, which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also laid before the Senate a petition of the Pacific Movement of the Eastern World, Inc., of St. Louis, Mo., praying for the passage of antilynching legislation, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also laid before the Senate a letter from S. L. Wharton, of Mansfield, La., endorsing Hon. JOHN H. OVERTON, a Senator from Louisiana, which was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. SMITH presented a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of South Carolina, favoring the passage of legislation to make available to farmers the benefits of credit extended through the crop and seed loan agency, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

(See resolution printed in full when laid before the Senate by the Vice President on the 19th instant, p. 908, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.)

Mr. LOGAN presented the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Kentucky, which was ordered to lie on the table:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
COMMONWEALTH OF KENTUCKY,
January 16, 1934.

Dr. Hill, of the county of Floyd, offered the following resolution, viz:

A concurrent resolution requesting prompt ratification of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Seaway Treaty

Whereas there is now before the Senate of the United States a treaty between the United States and the Dominion of Canada which provides the plans, allocation of tasks, estimates of costs, and commits the two Nations to increasing the usefulness of our inland seas by replacing obsolete equipment, standardizing of depths, and increasing capacity of channels, locks, and canals in the St. Lawrence River to meet present-day needs, so that the Great Lakes ports may be opened to the uninterrupted movement of ocean-borne commerce; and

Whereas an oceanway to the midcontinent, besides contributing importantly to national efficiency, is absolutely essential to place the interior of the United States on a world competitive basis: Therefore be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of Kentucky (the senate concurring therein), That the 1934 session of the general assembly hereby memorializes the Senate of the United States for the speedy commencement of construction of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence seaway project, and urgently requests the Members of the United States Senate, and the Senators from Kentucky in particular, that they not only support immediate ratification of the said seaway treaty but that they use every legitimate effort to impress upon midwestern agriculture and industries in world trade and as a major part in the President's public-works program for the relief of unemployment.

SEC. 2. The clerk of the house of representatives is hereby instructed to send copies of this resolution to each Member of the Senate of the Congress of the United States.

Attest:

J. ERWIN SANDERS,
Chief Clerk of House of Representatives.

Mr. LOGAN also presented the following resolution of the House of Representatives of the State of Kentucky, which was ordered to lie on the table:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
COMMONWEALTH OF KENTUCKY,
January 16, 1934.

Mr. Belknap, of the county of Oldham, offered the following resolution, viz:

A resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States to recognize the Federal Government's obligation to share equitably the proceeds of liquor taxes with the States, counties, and cities, and to prevent intergovernmental competition in the field of liquor taxation through the adoption of the recommendations presented by the Interstate Commission on Conflicting Taxation with the authority of the Interstate Assembly

Whereas there is grave danger that the anticipated benefits of repeal will be destroyed by unrestrained and competitive taxation of alcoholic beverages by the Federal Government and by the governments of the States, counties, and cities; and

Whereas the imposition by the Federal Government of taxes or other imposts on alcoholic beverages without regard to similar burdens imposed by the States, counties, and cities may result in a combined load of taxation so heavy as to encourage illicit traffic in these beverages; and

Whereas before Federal prohibition the States, counties, and cities depended on liquor taxes and license fees for a substantial proportion of their tax revenues, thus lightening the load of taxation on real property; and

Whereas if liquor taxes are again to carry a reasonable share of the State and local tax burden, it is essential that the taxation of alcoholic beverages by the Federal Government be not excessive; and

Whereas there is grave danger that unless immediate action is taken by the States, counties, and cities in establishing a line of communication with the Federal Government through such bodies as the Interstate Assembly and the Interstate Commission on Conflicting Taxation, the opportunity to secure a fair division of liquor tax revenues will be lost: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That Congress be urged to adopt the recommendations formulated by the Interstate Commission on Conflicting Taxation at a meeting in Washington, D.C., November 10–11, 1933, and ratified by the Interstate Assembly, which provide that, of the combined gross revenues from the liquor traffic derived by the Federal and State Governments from all sources, one half should inure to the benefit of the States and their localities and the remaining half should be retained by the Federal Government; be it further

Resolved, That the President of the United States be respectfully urged and requested to approve any bill embodying the principles of the above recommendations in order that the provisions thereof may become effective at an early date; and be it further

Resolved, That a certified copy of this joint resolution be sent to the President of the United States, the President of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each of the Members of the congressional delegation of this State.

Said resolution was adopted by the house of representatives.

J. ERWIN SANDERS,
Chief Clerk of the House.

Mr. COPELAND presented a resolution adopted by the Westchester County Realty Board, of White Plains, N.Y., favoring governmental assistance in furnishing long-term financing to aid construction of new single-family homes, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

He also presented a resolution adopted by Port Jervis (N.Y.) Lodge, No. 962, Brotherhood of Railway Carmen of America, protesting against the passage of any legislation that will decrease railroad employment by the consolidation of railroads, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a memorial signed by 37 employees of the Postal Telegraph Co., of Syracuse, N.Y., remonstrating against any merger of that company with any other telegraph company, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the board of directors of the Youngstown (N.Y.) Yacht Club, protesting against the proposed transfer of the Coast Guard to the Navy Department, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the New York State School Boards Association, Mount Vernon, N.Y., favoring the granting of Federal aid for public-school education, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Educational Committee of the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom, Manhattan (N.Y.) Branch, favoring an investigation of munition makers and lobbying by such manufacturers, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Tioga County Sportsmen's Association, of Owego, N.Y., favoring the passage of the so-called "duck stamp bill", which was referred to the Special Committee on the Conservation of Wild Life Resources.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Bronx County (N.Y.) Council, Veterans of Foreign Wars, favoring more liberal consideration of the matter of compensation and hospitalization in the treatment and care of disabled veterans, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the board of directors of the Buffalo (N.Y.) Junior Chamber of Commerce, favoring the restoration to officers of the armed forces of the United States of base pay increases and longevity pay, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented a resolution adopted by Staten Island (N.Y.) Chapter, No. 25, Disabled American Veterans of the World War, favoring an increase in the compensation allowed to disabled veterans under the so-called "Economy Act", which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the American League Against War and Fascism, of New York City, N.Y., protesting against appropriations for war purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the Corona Community Council, of Corona, and the West Forest Hills Civic and Community Association, Inc., of West Forest Hills, in the State of New York, favoring the passage of legislation extending the time for aliens who have entered this country illegally to become eligible for citizenship, which were referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the executive committee of the New York Department of the American Legion, favoring the consolidation of the Veterans' Bureau in Buffalo with the new veterans' hospital at Batavia, N.Y., which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Community Councils of the City of New York, Inc., favoring the immediate ratification of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Deep Waterway Treaty with Canada, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. DUFFY presented the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency:

Joint resolution memorializing Congress to aid and assist industry, and particularly the small business man

Whereas it is the sincere hope of all that recovery from this unprecedented economic depression be rapidly attained; and

Whereas in these United States laws are being enacted and enforced with this end in view; and

Whereas in the granting of legislative aid and assistance to the various classes and branches of industry there has been inadvertently overlooked that class which is in reality the backbone of our business world, namely, the small business man; and

Whereas the forward progress and growth of today's small business man is being retarded and stifled because this class is unable to any longer obtain loans from banks without collateral (character loans); and

Whereas there is today more money in circulation than in 1929; and

Whereas there has been for the past 10 years a steadily increasing restriction of credit on the part of banking examiners, both Federal and State, to industry, particularly the small business man; and

Whereas industry, particularly the small business man, must have credit in order to purchase merchandise to advantage, which assists very materially in furnishing employment, which in turn assists the farmer in securing a reasonable price for his products: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the senate (the assembly concurring), That this legislature respectfully memorializes the Congress of the United States to enact suitable legislation to provide funds for distribution through the banks of this country to enable industry, particularly the small business man, to make character loans at the local banks for a period of 2 years at a rate of interest not to exceed 4 percent, for the purpose of enhancing business of this class; be it further

Resolved, That suitably attested copies of this resolution be transmitted to the President of the United States, to both Houses of Congress, and to each Wisconsin Member thereof.

THOMAS J. O'MALLEY,
President of the Senate.
R. A. COBBAN,
Chief Clerk of the Senate.
C. T. YOUNG,
Speaker of the Assembly.
JOHN J. SLOCUM,
Chief Clerk of the Assembly.

Mr. DUFFY also presented the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce:

Joint resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States to establish uniform rules and regulations for the movement of all commodities in interstate commerce

Whereas the Federal Constitution specifically provides that no State shall, without the consent of Congress, lay any imposts or duties on imports or exports, except what may be absolutely necessary for executing its inspection laws; and

Whereas a number of States have been, and are now, providing embargoes on livestock, livestock products, dairy products, nursery plants, and other commodities under the pretense that such embargoes are necessary for executing their respective inspection laws; and

Whereas such embargoes have been, and now are, a serious handicap to the agricultural industry in this State; and

Whereas the Congress of the United States, under its constitutional power to regulate commerce among the several States, could prevent such embargoes by the enactment of uniform rules and regulations governing the movement of all commodities in interstate commerce: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the senate (the assembly concurring), That this legislature respectfully memorializes the Congress of the United States to establish uniform rules and regulations, under its constitutional power to regulate commerce among the several States, to prevent such embargoes and to regulate the free movement of all commodities in interstate commerce; be it further

Resolved, That properly attested copies of this resolution be sent to both Houses of Congress of the United States and to each Wisconsin Member thereof.

THOMAS J. O'MALLEY,
President of the Senate.
R. A. COBBAN,
Chief Clerk of the Senate.
C. T. YOUNG,
Speaker of the Assembly.
JOHN J. SLOCUM,
Chief Clerk of the Assembly.

THE WORLD COURT

Mr. DUFFY presented a resolution adopted by the Wisconsin Baptist State convention favoring the prompt ratification of the World Court protocols, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the Senate in 1926, by a vote of 76 to 17, approved the adherence of the United States to the World Court, with five reservations; and

Whereas these reservations are fully met, in the judgment of the Department of State and of such authoritative bodies as the American Bar Association, by the three treaties now awaiting the Senate's consent to ratification; and

Whereas the Democratic and Republican national platforms of last June both endorsed completing our adherence to the court under the terms of the three pending treaties, thus making it plain that the court is not a subject of partisan political controversy; and

Whereas the completion of our adherence to this outstanding agency for peaceful settlement might provide a stabilizing influence in these troubled times, both at home and abroad: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Wisconsin Baptist State convention hereby urges Senator DUFFY and Senator LA FOLLETTE to do all in their power to secure ratification of the three pending World Court treaties at the earliest practicable time; and be it further

Resolved, That Senator DUFFY is hereby asked to read this resolution into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

PROPOSED ABOLITION OF 15-PERCENT PAY CUT

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana presented a petition of sundry citizens of the State of Indiana praying for the enactment of legislation to abolish the 15-percent reduction in pay of Government employees under the so-called "Economy Act", which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD without the signatures, after the first one, as follows:

MEMORIAL TO THE CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES

We, the undersigned employees of the United States Government, declaring our need for immediate restoration of former salary levels, do respectfully petition the Congress to enact legislation sponsored by the American Federation of Labor and the American Federation of Government Employees to abolish the Government workers' pay cut at once.

CHARLES C. INGELS, Kokomo, Ind.

RESOLUTIONS OF AMERICAN FARM BUREAU FEDERATION

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD and appropriately referred the resolutions adopted at the recent annual convention of the American Farm Bureau Federation, and invite the attention of the Senate and the country to the position taken by this great national farm organization on matters covered in the resolutions.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I. AGRICULTURAL ADJUSTMENT ACT

The American Farm Bureau Federation assumed leadership in drafting and securing the enactment by Congress of the Agricultural Adjustment Act.

In its provisions, Congress not only authorizes but directs the administration to restore farm commodity prices to a parity basis and extends broad powers for such accomplishment. It authorizes and directs such readjustment of agricultural credit machinery as is necessary to assist deserving farmers in regaining and retaining their homes through long-time loans at low rates of interest and amortization on a basis of reasonable and fair appraisals.

It gives the President broad powers and authority to revise our unfair and unjust monetary system to an honest basis, whereby debts can be paid with dollars carrying the same commodity value as when debts were created.

We appreciate the sincerity of purpose universally shown by those charged with the administration of the respective provisions of the act, and recognize the difficulties in administration. We believe enough time and effort have been given to reconcile opposition to this legislation, which opposition largely consists of those who have enjoyed unjust and unfair advantages under the old system of processing and distribution.

Such delay is resulting in the bankruptcy of many more farmers and cannot be further condoned.

Particularly in the field of perishable farm commodities are we being forced to witness the absorption by producers of the amount of processing taxes levied. This never was either authorized or intended by Congress. It is largely the result of organized and determined opposition of processors in an effort to discredit the Agricultural Adjustment Act and thereby restore the old privilege system.

We urge that any or every power in the act be immediately invoked fully to put into effect parity prices for farm commodities, liberally assist deserving farmers to retain their property, and to stabilize our money system on a fair basis of commodity value.

To these ends, we pledge the full and united support of the American Farm Bureau Federation.

Farmers also have great responsibility to discharge by assisting government through genuine cooperation in efforts to restore agriculture to a basis of equality with other business and industry. Only to the extent this assistance by farmers is given, can the administrators of the act be fully effective and successful in their efforts.

We believe the Agricultural Adjustment Act should be broadened to include other prominent farm commodities. We further believe its trade agreement section should be amended to provide for agreements by the administration with producers and/or, processors. We will support other amendments that experience in administration may disclose advisable or necessary to more fully and effectively carry out its statement of policy and purpose.

The American Farm Bureau Federation recognizes that no law is better or more effective than its administration.

It is, therefore, urged, that only those known to be thoroughly sympathetic to and capable of successful administration be retained or employed to administer the Agricultural Adjustment Act.

II. MONETARY MATTERS

We commend President Roosevelt for his far-reaching and sound policies in regard to revaluation of the dollar, and we trust this action will soon be followed by the definite establishment of a ratio of purchasing power between the dollar and the index numbers of all commodities. The Nation, from an agricultural point of view, has been suffering from a period of deflation for years. It is time that we enter a reflation era in which money and credits are to be aided rather than hindered in the velocity of their movements and where commodity prices, rather than the weight and the price of gold, will determine the purchasing power of the dollar. We support the President in his efforts to establish the value of the dollar on the commodity basis and thereafter maintain it on the price index of all commodities. We call attention also to the desirability of remonetizing silver on the index basis so that we may add a greater volume of money to our circulating medium, increase both credit and currency in the Nation, and place our Nation in better position to expand trade with silver-using countries. We call particular attention to the inability of credit expansion alone solving our monetary and fiscal difficulties at the present time.

III. FARM CREDITS

The Emergency Farm Mortgage Act of 1933 and the Farm Credit Act of 1933 reflect efforts which the farm bureau has put forth for 10 years on the farm-mortgage question and general farm financing. We have maintained that interest on farm mortgages must be lower; that annual payments must be easier; that farmers who are temporarily delinquent in farm-mortgage payments or otherwise must be carried along without foreclosure and eviction with their delinquencies added to the end of the mortgage period; that cooperative farm organizations should be eligible to receive the lowest possible interest rate; that cooperative-purchasing organizations should be recognized in the Federal statutes; and that farmer ownership and farmer control must be reinstated and maintained.

These features are now incorporated in recent farm-credit legislation. However, the laws are not perfect either in administration or in text.

(1) The appraisals continue to be too low on many farms.

(2) The emergencies of the farm-debt situation demand a more rapid flow of funds into farm credits.

(3) The present situation has been developing for more than a decade, so that commendable as otherwise the activities of Farm Credit Administration would be in approving loans to farmers, at this particular time still greater activity is recommended.

(4) The interest rate on farm mortgages should be lowered to not exceeding 3 percent.

(5) A revolving fund should be set up in the United States Treasury to buy both the land-bank bonds and intermediate-credit debentures, when necessary.

(6) Adequate additional appropriations to the commissioner fund for emergency loans are recommended.

(7) The intermediate-credit banks must have more funds readily available.

(8) Recognition should be given to existing farm-credit agencies which, with slight change, could be adapted to the production-credit field and thereby remove the necessity of setting up new organizations in areas which are already occupied.

(9) Notwithstanding the present governmental activities in establishing farm-credit agencies, which are essential in the present emergency, we reaffirm our belief in the necessity of setting up our own farmer-owned and farmer-controlled credit machinery and the advisability of converting the governmental agencies into a farmer-owned system at the earliest possible time.

(10) A lower interest rate and lower inspection and filing charges on loans in production credit associations are necessary.

(11) The regional agricultural credit corporations should be continued in areas where needed adequately to serve agriculture until the present credit emergency is over.

IV. FOOD AND DRUG ACT

Fraudulent advertising in print and by radio, the sale of harmful drugs and cosmetics, and similar practices should be prevented by proper amendments to the present Food and Drug Act.

No discrimination, however, should be permitted against healthful raw-food products or their processed forms, such as butter, maple sirup, and fruit.

Court decisions for many years have given the Federal Government large powers and wide interpretations of the present act. Whatever amendments are needed should be added to the present law, rather than rewriting the entire Food and Drug Act.

V. CODES FOR THE BREWERY AND DISTILLING INDUSTRIES

We insist that the promises to use domestic products exclusively, made before committees of Congress by those who represent the brewery and distilling industries, be kept. If the codes and marketing agreements which deal with these trades are not changed to require the use of domestic products, such as cereals and hops, the issue will be taken to Congress to compel this action. It is particularly annoying to discover a provision in the marketing agreement for the distilled-spirits industry that blackstrap molasses in quantities sufficient for a year's supply now within the United States will deny the producers of cereal crops any opportunity for 12 months to sell their grains for distillation purposes.

We insist that if these codes are not changed soon to comply with the above recommendations that public hearings again be held so that all interests may properly be protected.

VI. GRAIN EXCHANGES AND SPECULATION

We condemn the proposed code of fair competition prepared by the grain exchanges and defended by them in recent public hearings at Washington. This document failed to give recognition to the great grain cooperatives which either have membership on grain exchanges or need fuller recognition of membership on exchange affiliates. This document also failed utterly to include any provisions which in practice would reduce speculations in grains.

It is evident that grain-exchange representatives are still pursuing their old tactics of opposing cooperative marketing and any control of speculation. It is equally evident that the controversy will need again to be taken to Congress to give cooperatives that recognition on grain and other exchanges which laws already declare, but which is denied by the administrators of the exchanges. Speculation evidently cannot be limited by voluntary action of exchanges. The Grain Futures Act should be consolidated with the Cotton Trading Act, so that grains and cotton may be placed under proper control in our great terminal markets.

We also favor regulation and control of stock exchanges. Recent disclosures by the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency have awakened public opinion to the necessity of regulating these great markets. In like manner the grain and cotton markets must be controlled and regulated, as the iniquities on these exchanges are as great as those which have been exposed on stock exchanges. We recommend separate legislation to correct the situation which exists both on the stock exchanges and on the grain and cotton exchanges.

We urge Secretary Wallace to compel grain-exchange representatives to rewrite the code pursuant to the above recommendations, or to reject it in its present form.

VII. POSTAL AFFAIRS

The rate on first-class postage should be reduced to 2 cents per ounce. The development and expansion of parcel-post business and the increase of volume of all postal material will aid in reducing rates. Approval can be given to consolidation of rural routes where highway facilities permit without unduly delaying mail delivery or making it wholly impossible in bad weather; but we oppose indiscriminate canceling or consolidation of these routes in an effort to make the Post Office Department pay a profit. The Director of Parcel Post is proceeding properly in going out for new business; new business may be had if the Postal Service will go after it. One cause of the postal deficit is easily found in the subsidies which are given various transportation agencies for the carrying of United States mails. Reasonable compensation should be given these carriers, but subsidies are indefensible. We shall resist the substitution of the contract system for the present rural carrier system.

VIII. GUARANTY OF BANK DEPOSITS

Guaranty or insurance of bank deposits must be provided in a Nation-wide plan, such as is now incorporated in the Banking Act of 1933. Small deposits should have complete protection, with graduated protection downward as deposits increase.

IX. PRODUCTION CONTROL

Production control, under the terms of the Agricultural Adjustment Act and otherwise, needs consideration, both from the point of view of producing less and in enlarging the domestic ability to consume.

There are various ways of preventing, controlling, and disposing of surpluses other than limiting production, desirable as that may be. The industrial market for farm crops, if thoroughly developed, would eliminate much of the present surplus.

It is stated as our conviction that any extent of reducing the production of farm crops will not be effective in raising prices on them as much as farmers desire or as much as the Adjustment Act indicates until, first, the home market is more definitely developed in its industrial and inedible outlets, and, second, until the provisions of the Adjustment Act which authorize, in substance, higher rates on imported commodities are put into effect.

The administrators of the Adjustment Act must invoke, more than has down to this date been invoked, the licensing powers over dealers, processors, and middlemen, particularly those which handle imported commodities, so that the farmer will be made the first and greatest beneficiary in the administration of the act.

We particularly call attention to the inconsistency of the Government's giving great assistance to the development of new irrigations projects while the farmers of our Nation are reducing their crop production.

X. SUGAR-MARKETING AGREEMENT

We commend Secretary Wallace for his recent refusal to approve the proposed sugar marketing agreement, which, if put into operation, would have given first benefits to foreign sugar interests; second benefits to domestic refiners; and third benefits, if any, to the American farmers who produce cane and beets. No farm commodity, basic or otherwise, should have the welfare of its producers subjected to the self-interested domination of foreign and importing interests.

We recommend that the domestic sugar producers in any sugar marketing agreement be allowed to increase their production gradually and that a corresponding decrease in imports of sugar be put into effect.

XI. PRESERVING HOME MARKETS

The Adjustment Administration is asking our farmers to reduce production and with remarkable enthusiasm the farmers are doing so; but the dairy farmer, the corn farmer, the soybean farmer, the hog farmer, the cattle farmer, the cotton farmer—in fact, any farmer who produces any crop from which an oil or fat may be extracted, or from which industrial alcohol may be made, or from which starches may be manufactured—is merely giving the home market over to American capital invested abroad, when he reduces his production down to the domestic requirements, unless the administrators of the Adjustment Act close these and other breaches in the agricultural tariff wall. If this situation continues, the farm bureau will need to adopt as its motto "Effective tariffs for all, or tariffs for none."

We realize the time has passed, now that we are a creditor nation, when farm groups might safely oppose one another in securing protection within the home market. Our most formidable adversary is not in domestic competition; that will always exist. We need to look now to our foreign competitors, and it requires a solid front on the part of all farm groups, not merely to preserve what we have already secured in the way of protection but to acquire that complete privilege of supplying the home market which we must have. It is not now possible to survive on the basis of each farmer for himself, or each farm group for itself. We must work until every farm group in the United States has complete protection in the home market.

Since American farmers are limiting production to domestic requirements on basic farm commodities, they must be assured the domestic market. A large list of vegetable, animal, and marine oils and fats, particularly coconut oil, are duty free or carry low rates. Oleomargarine, closely connected in its manufacturing with coconut oil, is a direct development of the duty-free situation on oils and fats and is a direct threat to our dairy, livestock, cotton, and soybean producers.

Canned and cured meats in large import quantities are likewise extremely harmful. Tropical starches and blackstrap molasses for distillation purposes depress the prices of many of our farm products.

The Philippine Islands must be granted immediate independence with a period of not to exceed 5 years in which to adjust their commerce among the nations of the world. During this transition period there should be a gradual reduction of duty-free tonnages of Philippine products and a gradual step-up of rates of duty on such products.

XII. RECOGNITION OF COOPERATIVE MARKETING

We appreciate the extension of the definition of cooperative marketing in the Farm Credit Act of 1933, in which purchasing cooperatives are made eligible to receive loans. Farm Credit Administration is urged to cooperate with representatives of the purchasing groups for the purpose of studying how they can best serve the interests of agriculture, can correlate their activities with general farm organizations, and can best qualify for loans. The Agricultural Adjustment Act specifically does not give recognition either to cooperative marketing organizations or to cooperative purchasing groups. We commend the administrators of the act for their desire to aid cooperative marketing, but we regret that the act gives greater recognition to processors, middlemen, and manufacturers than is given to cooperative groups. The cooperative marketing principle is based on business foundations. The leaders of our great cooperative movements are worthy to be compared with those in any other corporate enterprise. More than all, it must be considered in the administration of the act that responsible officials in cooperative and general farm organizations have in mind always the welfare of the farmer.

We insist that cooperative organizations be recognized in marketing agreements and agricultural codes as being efficient agencies for the marketing of farm crops and the control of farm surpluses.

XIII. RECIPROCAL TRADE AGREEMENTS

While we appreciate the possibilities of reciprocal trade agreements with foreign countries, we must not minimize their dangers. The welfare of the American producers of dairy, poultry, cereal, livestock, vegetable, fruit, fiber crops, and other agricultural products must not be sacrificed in any effort to expand industrial markets abroad. No power should be delegated by act of Congress to negotiate and put into effect reciprocal executive trade agreements with foreign countries that would be detrimental to agriculture.

XIV. TRANSPORTATION

Railroad, motor-vehicle, waterway, and airway transportation rates and services must be kept competitive. No single regulatory body should have authority over all forms of transportation. Consolidation of railroads is advisable, provided transportation competition in any area is not sacrificed. Reasonable restrictions as to size, weight, length, and similar features of truck transportation should be adopted. Farm-to-market highways must be expanded not only by the emergency fund in Public Works Administration but by forthcoming regular appropriations for highway construction.

The code of fair competition for the trucking industry now under consideration by N.R.A. should not be approved. It provides for uniform rates by motor vehicle and other transport facilities; it denies the farmer-owned truck hauling products and supplies for the neighborhood; it prohibits cooperative organizations continuing their present trucking for members; it gives complete control of truck transportation through a code control committee to be composed exclusively of contract and common-carrier representatives. All of these features are obnoxious.

There should be a general reduction in freight rates on farm commodities effective for the entire United States proportionate to that which has recently been given by the western carriers on passenger rates.

The St. Lawrence waterway should be completed with the least possible delay; to make it possible for work to start on the international section in the near future, the treaty with Canada as it is now pending before the Senate of the United States should be ratified early in the 1934 session of Congress.

XV. MEMBERSHIP ACQUISITION

The accomplishments of the American Farm Bureau Federation justify the active membership support of every thinking farmer in America.

These accomplishments can best be safe-guarded, perpetuated, and strengthened by an ever-increasing membership. We, therefore, urge the officers and directors of the American Farm Bureau Federation, State leaders, and every delegate and member in attendance at this convention, to put forth every proper effort throughout 1934 to mobilize every thinking farmer within the respective States under the banner of the farm bureau as a first essential to restore agriculture to its proper relation with other business and industry, and to speed the return of prosperity to the Nation.

XVI. APPROPRIATIONS

Agricultural services supported by Federal appropriations have already taken great reduction. We will oppose any further reductions in support of agricultural activities greater than is suffered by other services given by the Government. Adequate Federal funds for agricultural education are necessary. Fundamental research for agriculture, the land-grant institutions, the agricultural experiment stations, vocational training, and agricultural extension are meeting unusual tasks in splendid ways.

Educational work in connection with the Agricultural Adjustment Administration, Farm Credit Administration, the Federal home-loan bank, Civilian Conservation Corps, and similar legislation has placed a greater burden on agencies of educational nature than has ever before been experienced. We urge Congress to provide sufficient funds. Funds for general education in elementary and high schools must be maintained so that our educational facilities and standards may continue on the high level which has characterized them in recent years. We advocate a resumption of the usual annual appropriations for highway purposes by the Federal Government when the funds now available under the Public Works Administration, for primary and secondary roads, have been thoroughly allocated to and expended by the States. We advocate use of funds from Public Works Administration for agricultural activities of the Federal Government and for conservation work in protecting our soil and other natural resources.

XVII. ERADICATION OF BOVINE TUBERCULOSIS

Immediate completion of the Federal program of bovine tuberculosis eradication is requested for the protection of public health. We are firmly convinced that the eradication program should be completed during this period of low cow prices when infected animals can be eliminated at minimum cost, and when removal of reactor cows can materially help dairymen in reducing surplus milk.

XVIII. UTILITY RATES

The lack of adequate income in recent years from our farms, the desirability of having modern conveniences and equipment in all our homes, and of saving labor in farm and home operations all require a greater use of electricity, water, gas, telephone, and similar services. The rates for these services, however, have been, and are now, so high as to prevent many of our people from using these conveniences of modern life. It has been particularly true that the cost of electrical current, measured in terms of generation and distribution, has been too high, and that overcapitalization, pyramiding of costs, excessive salaries, and the equivalent of blue-sky issues of stock have compelled the consumers of this current to pay tribute to an indefensible economic practice.

XIX. CREDITS FOR UNION OF SOVIET SOCIALIST REPUBLICS

Since recognition by the United States Government has been given to the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, we urge that our Government extend proper credits to the Soviet Union to enable it to buy our farm products for its domestic consumption.

XX. A PLANNED AGRICULTURE

Soil conservation, production control, protection for agricultural products, cooperative marketing, purchasing and finance, conservation of natural resources, the development of better homes and communities in rural sections, the acquisition by different units of government of marginal land and its retirement from production of competitive crops, and similar problems demand that there be a coordination of effort and activity of every organization or agency—private, associational, or governmental—to so solve these problems as to give us that national planning for agriculture which we so long have needed and now must have, if agriculture is to survive. The land-grant institutions, the agricultural extension agencies, vocational workers in agriculture, great national farm organizations, Nation-wide cooperative marketing and purchasing groups, the officers in Farm Credit Administration, the Secretary of Agriculture and all similar officials and representatives in States and counties must now work together to accomplish the economic salvation of agriculture. Division or controversy will mean ruin. Cooperation and coordination mean success. We must set aside hesitancy of governmental action and priority or precedence among organizations to secure for the individual farmer, whom we all serve, the welfare and the advantages which he must have.

XXI. DIRECT BUYING OF LIVESTOCK

We favor governmental control and regulation of direct buying of livestock as practiced by processors and packers. We urge the Secretary of Agriculture to take such action under present laws as may be necessary to remove the disastrous influence and effect such direct buying has on the price levels of livestock.

XXII. HOME AND COMMUNITY

1. In order to secure a better cross section of agricultural and Farm Bureau thought, the membership of important American Farm Bureau committees, such as resolutions committee, should be drawn from a wider field than has been customary. Qualified women as well as men should be used on this as well as other important committees.

2. It is our conviction that the Department of Agriculture would be appreciably strengthened if the farm viewpoint could be taken into consideration more consistently in its program making. This is especially true in connection with home economics, agricultural extension, and 4-H club work. A farm woman should be added to the staff of the Department to assist in the policy-making work of the Department.

3. We reiterate our stand demanding adequate tariff protection against the importation of all fats and oils and any unfinished products from which these may be extracted.

4. We advocate a truth in fabrics law to apply to all fabrics.

5. We advocate an extension of governmental control of the advertising of foods, drugs, and cosmetics.

6. We believe the education of children is the business of the Nation, and we reiterate our stand in favor of Federal aid for elementary schools.

XXIII. THE 1934 CENTURY OF PROGRESS

We urge that the 1934 Century of Progress in planning its exhibits and program give greater recognition to agriculture as our basic creative industry of vital interest to urban and rural citizens alike, and that copy of this resolution be delivered to Rufus C. Dawes, president of the Century of Progress Exposition.

XXIV. CHILD LABOR AMENDMENT

We reaffirm our former opposition to the proposed amendment to the Federal Constitution relating to child labor. We are in complete sympathy with State and Federal laws to close sweatshops, to give fair wages to all workers, and to prevent children of immature ages being employed.

We are not, however, in favor of denying the employment of the youth of our land, particularly in those months during which school is not in session, or in the daylight hours of the school period, before and after school sessions. The habits of industry on the farm and in the city, which are inculcated by the employment of youths, is an invaluable asset in later life. If this is prohibited in early life, it may reasonably be expected that more difficulties will be encountered in getting adults in later years to accept employment.

XXV. LIVESTOCK LEGISLATION

We endorse a program for livestock legislation, giving an export certificate equivalent to 40 percent ad valorem on exports of livestock and livestock and dairy products, produced in continental United States; said certificate to be negotiable and acceptable at any port of entry in the United States in the payment of duties on imports received from countries to which such livestock exports have been consigned.

XXVI. TAXATION

I. The farm tax problem

Taxation presents many of the most serious economic and social problems now confronting agriculture. Tax levies on property are inequitable and have become extremely burdensome. In many parts of the country they are literally confiscating the value of property, depriving hundreds of thousands of families of their farms and homes, and producing maladjustments in the utilization of land and other natural resources. Yet, for lack of revenue, many rural communities are being denied adequate educational opportunities and other necessary services. This, if allowed to continue, will undermine the very foundation of rural progress with destructive effects on our national life.

II. Principles

1. Only such governmental services should be continued as can be justified on the basis of merit in the light of existing economic and social conditions and in the light of alternative methods of meeting the respective needs of society for which governmental services are performed.

2. Every consistent action must be taken to effect efficiency in government and thereby make it responsive to the needs of society and operate at a minimum cost.

3. Taxes to finance the fundamental services of government should be levied in accordance with the principle of ability to pay. Fundamental services are here interpreted to mean those which are essential to the economic, social, and political welfare and safety of the people. Special services of government, other than those referred to above as general, should be financed wholly or in part from fees or assessments levied in accordance with the benefit principle.

4. Except for the purpose of equalizing economic opportunity, no special consideration should ever be given to any industry, locality, or class of persons.

5. The significant facts of any system of taxation, including its social and economic effects, should be under constant and impartial scrutiny and should be given the widest possible publicity as the only proper basis for intelligent modification of any taxing system.

III. Federal and State coordination

The problem of securing necessary adjustments in taxation as it relates to agricultural and other property is not only a matter of State taxation but is also closely related to national taxation. In recent years the fiscal necessities of the States and of the Federal Government have caused each to invade fields of revenue of the other, causing numerous duplications and conflicts of interest. It is, therefore, more necessary than ever before that proper adjustment and coordination be made, in State and Federal taxation, if those adjustments and revisions are to be made within the individual States which the American Farm Bureau Federation has long advocated as essential if adequate reductions in the present unjust burdens on property are to be made.

We reaffirm the stand taken by the American Farm Bureau Federation in 1931 in favor of a national commission to study and to make recommendations upon the interrelation of Federal and State taxation, to the end that a consistent plan may be developed for the coordination of Federal and State taxes. The general objectives of such a plan should be (1) to insure adequate revenues, (2) to avoid those forms of double taxation that are unjust to the taxpayer and harmful to agriculture and business, (3) to insure more economical and effective administration of State and Federal tax laws, and, above all (4) to further the ends of social justice among individuals and economic groups by allocating the responsibility for the support of the general functions of government according to the principle of ability to pay. Particular functions of government, however, such as the construction and maintenance of roads, should be financed by taxes levied as nearly as practicable according to benefits received. Such a commission should be provided for and financed by act of Congress and appointed by the President and should be fairly representative of the Federal Government and the States, with individual members chosen for their impartial scholarship and progressive thought in the field of public finance. This body should cooperate as fully as practicable with agencies already at work on problems of the coordination of Federal and State taxes.

IV. Recommended action

Realizing that definite action can and must be taken on several phases of taxation before such a commission could complete its findings and recommendations, we now urge the following action:

1. That the Federal Government grant to the individual taxpayer a substantial offset on his income tax for income taxes paid to the States. This we believe to be both legally sound and administratively practicable in view of experience under the Federal estate tax. In revising the Federal personal income tax to include the principle now applied to the estate tax, we believe that the total tax which personal income as such should bear should be determined on the principle that every citizen should contribute to the support of government according to his ability. This principle justifies low exemptions and progressive rates. The offset should be such as to yield to the Federal Government a larger proportion of the total tax paid on the larger incomes.

2. The revenues to the States under State income taxation should be used so as to reduce the property tax, especially on farms and homes, and not as additions to total expenditures.

3. Loss of revenues to the Federal Government through the proposed offset should be met by appropriate adjustments in exemptions and rates, by new taxes, or by both. In view of the rapid growth of sales taxation in the States, largely as emergency revenue measures, we believe that certain forms of taxation of sales and transactions should be considered as better suited to the Federal Government from the standpoint of administrative feasibility and uniformity of effect on competing businesses. While recognizing that such forms of taxation are justified under present conditions as emergency measures and as a supplement to the major sources of revenue in a Federal and State tax structure, we strongly reaffirm our opposition to the general sales tax as a substitute for progressive taxation of income and inheritance and appropriate levies on business, in an equitable tax structure. These fundamental elements of a sound tax system must not be replaced or weakened by a general sales tax which tends to fall most heavily on those least able to pay.

4. We believe that the exemption of securities from the income tax affords opportunity for wealth to escape proper taxation, and that the public loses far more in revenue than it gains through greater ease of marketing tax-exempt securities. Hence we recommend that every practicable effort be made to end as soon as possible this opportunity to escape taxation.

5. We recommend that the Federal Government and the States discontinue the present tendency to resort to the gasoline tax for general revenue, and that this tax be used exclusively for roads and streets as it affords a practical opportunity to finance these facilities on the principle of benefits received.

6. The limitations imposed by the Federal statutes upon taxing powers of States over national banks has created a serious problem in most of the States. It has occasioned litigation, necessitated legislation changing the rate of taxation of stocks and bonds, required modifications in the method and rate of taxation applied to general business corporations, and materially reduced the possibilities of developing new and proper taxes. We recommend that the Congress of the United States so amend section 5219, Revised Statutes of the United States, as to remove the restrictions now imposed on the taxing power of the States and to empower States to tax national banks in the same manner and to the same extent as they tax State banks.

7. In addition to the compelling necessity of reducing the tax burden on property through economy in public expenditures and greater emphasis on other sources of revenue, it is also necessary that the property tax itself be improved by strengthening the assessment, by levying the tax in accordance with the economic characteristics of property, and by strictly confining exemption from taxation to those properties for which exemption is clearly justifiable on grounds of definite public interest.

8. Taxes on liquor should be high enough to yield substantial revenue but not so high as to foster bootlegging.

XXVII. EXPANSION OF FOREIGN MARKETS

Whereas on December 11 the statement was issued from the White House as follows:

"As far back as last March, in his discussions of the agricultural policy, the President discussed with Mr. Peek the possibility and the advisability of reopening foreign markets for agricultural surpluses. It was decided at that time that the immediate domestic supply should be restricted, in view of the fact that foreign markets were closed temporarily by tariffs, quotas, etc., so that the immediate task was to restrict production until the machinery for the limitation of burdensome surpluses could be put in operation.

"Now the time has come to initiate the second part of the program and to correlate the two parts, the internal adjustment of production with such effective foreign purchasing power as may be developed by reciprocal tariffs, barter, and other international arrangements."

We therefore urge that every effort be made to initiate this second part of the program as soon as possible, so that the foreign markets will be reopened for agricultural surpluses and that the domestic market of the farmer may be maintained independent of the world prices for the surpluses and as a part of such program; to the extent necessary proceeds of processing taxes be made available for the removal of such surpluses and the expansion of markets.

This program is in complete accord with every pronouncement of the American Farm Bureau Federation on surplus control since the annual meeting of 1925.

XXVIII. INCREASED FARM COSTS

It has become painfully evident in recent months that prices on farm products have not increased in proportion to increases in farm costs on articles farmers must buy. Two causes for this disparity may be pointed out. First, the profiteering by certain industries in unduly raising prices on their manufactured products, and, second, the industrial codes under N.R.A., which, by near-price fixing, increased permitted costs in manufacturing, and elimination of competitive practices not only allow but authorize varying amounts of price and profit increases.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. FLETCHER, from the Committee on Banking and Currency, to which was referred the bill (H.R. 6670) to provide for the establishment of a corporation to aid in the refinancing of farm debts, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 198) thereon.

Mr. SHEPPARD, from the Committee on Commerce, to which were referred the following bills, reported them each without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

S. 1985. A bill relating to the amortization of the construction cost of certain toll bridges in the State of Oregon (Rept. No. 199); and

S. 2029. A bill to extend the time for completing the construction of a bridge across the Delaware River near Trenton, N.J. (Rept. No. 200).

INVESTIGATION OF AIR MAIL AND OCEAN MAIL CONTRACTS

Mr. McKELLAR, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to which was referred the resolution (S.Res. 143) enlarging the authority of the special committee investigating air mail and ocean mail contracts, reported it without amendment, and it was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

PRINTING OF HEARINGS ON STOCK-EXCHANGE PRACTICES

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, by direction of the Committee on Printing, I report favorably two Senate resolutions, one an original resolution, relating to the printing of documents and ask for their immediate consideration. Senate Resolution No. 144 is reported without amendment.

There being no objection, the resolution (S.Res. 144), submitted by Mr. FLETCHER on the 17th instant, was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That, in accordance with paragraph 3 of section 2 of the Printing Act, approved March 1, 1907, the Committee on Banking and Currency of the Senate be, and is hereby, empowered to have printed 1,000 additional copies of parts 1 and 2 of the hearings held before said committee during the second session of the Seventy-third Congress on stock-exchange practices.

PRINTING OF ANNUAL REPORT OF DAUGHTERS OF THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION

Mr. HAYDEN, from the Committee on Printing, reported a resolution (S.Res. 149), which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Thirty-sixth Annual Report of the National Society of the Daughters of the American Revolution, for the year ended April 1, 1933, be printed, with illustrations, as a Senate document.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BYRNES:

A bill (S. 2428) to prohibit a Senator or Member of Congress from representing an individual, firm, or corporation in procuring the award of a contract, the payment of a claim, or the making of a loan by any department of the Government; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. SHEPPARD:

A bill (S. 2429) authorizing the President to order Donald O. Miller before a retiring board for a hearing of his case, and upon the findings of such board determine whether or not he be placed on the retired list with the rank and pay held by him at the time of his resignation; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

(Mr. O'MAHONEY introduced Senate bill 2430, which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys and appears under a separate heading.)

By Mr. COPELAND:

A bill (S. 2431) for the relief of the estate of Joseph Y. Underwood; to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. 2432) to reduce passport fees, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

A bill (S. 2433) authorizing the President to present a gold medal to George M. Cohan; to the Committee on the Library.

A bill (S. 2434) granting an increase of pension to Helen K. Snowden; and

A bill (S. 2435) granting a pension to Grace A. Walker; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. DUFFY:

A bill (S. 2436) authorizing loans by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to public and private colleges, universities, and institutions of higher learning, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

(By request.) A bill (S. 2437) to provide for the reincorporation of the National Daughters of the Grand Army of the Republic; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. TYDINGS:

A bill (S. 2438) to amend the White Slave Traffic Act; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. BACHMAN:

A bill (S. 2439) for the relief of the Goldsmith Metal Lath Co., Price-Evans Foundry Corporation, and R. W. Felix; to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. 2440) to provide for the addition of certain lands to the Chickamauga and Chattanooga National Military Parks in the States of Tennessee and Georgia; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. KING:

A bill (S. 2441) for the relief of the Zion's Savings Bank & Trust Co., of Salt Lake City, Utah; to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. 2442) for the protection of the municipal water supply of the city of Salt Lake, State of Utah; to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

By Mr. LONERGAN:

A bill (S. 2443) for the relief of Ella B. Kimball, daughter and only heir of Jeremiah Simonson; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. CAPPER:

A bill (S. 2444) granting an increase of pension to Eliza A. Perry (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. STEPHENS:

A bill (S. 2445) to authorize the Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of Commerce to exchange a portion of the naval station and a portion of the lighthouse reservation at Key West, Fla.; to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. HATCH:

A bill (S. 2446) for the relief of John J. Doyle; and

A bill (S. 2447) for the relief of Anna Hathaway; to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. 2448) providing payment to employees, Bureau of Reclamation, for mileage traveled in privately owned automobiles; to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation.

A bill (S. 2449) granting an increase of pension to Cornelia W. East; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. McCARRAN:

A bill (S. 2450) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce", approved February 4, 1887, as amended and supplemented; to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

A bill (S. 2451) relating to the payment of certain construction charges on the Truckee-Carson Irrigation District, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation.

By Mr. NORRIS:

A joint resolution (S.J.Res. 74) authorizing necessary funds to conduct investigation regarding rates charged for electrical energy and to prepare report thereon; to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

CONTROL OF PUBLIC DOMAIN

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, in the Seventy-second Congress my distinguished predecessor, the late Senator Kendrick, of Wyoming, introduced a bill to provide for granting to certain public-land States certain areas of the public domain within their respective borders. I was under the impression that that bill had been reintroduced by him at the first session of the present Congress. I find that I was mistaken. I should like to introduce a similar bill at this time, and I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for 2 minutes in explanation of the introduction of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the bill will be received and appropriately referred, and, without objection, the Senator is recognized for 2 minutes.

The bill (S. 2430) to provide for the granting of public lands to certain States, for the elimination of lands from national forests, parks, reservations, and withdrawals in connection with such grants, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, this measure opens up a rather fundamental controversy between those who contend for control of the remaining public domain by the States and those who believe that it should be controlled by the Federal Government. Bills have been introduced upon both sides of the problem. There is now pending, I understand, in the House of Representatives, the so-called "Taylor bill." The bill introduced in the last Congress by the late Senator Kendrick, and which I now present, provides for the preservation to the Federal Government of the royalties which it now derives from the operation of the public domain.

In some of the Western States, of which Wyoming is one, there has been developed a very successful and efficient manner of handling the public domain. However, it is generally recognized that there is a wide division of opinion with respect to the manner in which this problem should be solved. My own feeling is that it deserves the most serious consideration of the committee and of the Senate, and for that reason I shall ask that an article which recently appeared in the Saturday Evening Post, being an interview of Secretary Ickes with Mr. Marquis James on The National Domain, shall be made a part of my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From the Saturday Evening Post, Dec. 23, 1933]

THE NATIONAL DOMAIN

Here is a small piece of paper containing a few lines hastily written with a lead pencil. It is unsigned, but perhaps you might recognize the angular handwriting of the President of the United States. Let me read to you what he has written:

Total dams and ditches, $13,500,000; hydroelectric, $6,000,000; first year, $4,500,000; acres to be irrigated, 60,000; elimination submargin, 300,000; subtract, 60,000; total elimination, 240,000.

I intend to preserve this paper. It is interesting now. To my grandchildren it will be more so, as one of the acorns from which great oaks have grown.

The foregoing sets forth, in its shirt sleeves, the latest and most authoritative advices I have at hand on a pertinent phase of the spacious subject of our national domain and its conservation. The President jotted it down as we talked a few days ago. As everyone knows, reclamation of farming lands by irrigation is one arm of the diverse policy of conservation. That means bringing in more acres of tillable soil, and, quite naturally, the question arises: Why should we add to the sum of farming lands on the edge of the desert when, to get rid of the surplus of farm produce, we are having farmers in the old-established agricultural belts plow under standing crops? If that were all there is to irrigation, there would be no excuse for it; and such, indeed, has been the old irrigation policy.

But under the new set-up the case takes on a different color. By this policy for every acre brought in by reclamation there will be withdrawn from cultivation, or attempted cultivation, submarginal lands of equal producing capacity, the ratio being about 5 acres withdrawn for every acre brought in.

The President's memorandum portrays a hypothetical example. We engage to spend on irrigation dams and ditches $13,500,000, say, and for hydroelectric equipment $6,000,000 more; the first year's expenditure being $4,500,000. Assume that ultimately this will transform 60,000 desert acres into crop-bearing soil, every acre of which, productively, will be worth 5 acres of submarginal land. Thus 300,000 acres of poor land will be retired, and we shall have 240,000 fewer acres in production than before.

WHAT THE NEW LAND POLICY WILL DO

This exemplifies a good land policy, a good conservation policy, a good social policy. Think what it will mean to the poor devils now eking out a squalid existence on soil which, in this country, one has no business trying to farm, to put them on land where, with the same or less effort, they can enjoy their share of the desirable things of life. In 1929, which was a pretty good farm year, 28 percent of all the farms in the United States produced less than $600 apiece; and this production comprised only 3.38 percent of all farm products sold in the United States. Forty-nine percent of our farms produced less than $1,000 apiece, and this production was less than 11 percent of the national cash farm income. This shows where approximately half of our farm population stands today. As for their influence on production and on the surplus—why, it amounts to only slightly more than the effect of a couple of good seasonable rains in the Corn Belt.

We are ascertaining for the first time the amount of poor land that should be retired from cultivation, and in round figures it seems to foot up to something in the neighborhood of 25,000,000 acres.

We have learned to take the birdseye view and to zone our cities, directing that in this area we shall have residences, in this retail stores, in this manufacturing. We now undertake to achieve a grand vision of the whole country, saying that this land shall be cropped, this shall be range, this shall be forest, this shall be worked for minerals. In this way, and no other, can we properly conserve—that is to say, use wisely—our natural resources and provide for a more equable distribution of their bounties.

We have reached the end of the pioneering period of go ahead and take. We are in an age of planning for the best use of everything for all. We must ultimately pull out from low-scale agricultural production, with its attendant evils of low-standard living, some millions of acres of submerged lands. One fifth as many good acres will take care of the people now scratching them for an existence and will open for these people the gates of a happier life. The abandoned acres should pass back to the control of the Federal Government to be administered for the benefit of the Nation as a whole. In the East this land largely should be added to our national forests. In the West, generally speaking, it should revert to the public domain as an addition to our grazing ranges. The Indians, who are badly in need, should also get their share. By such redistribution, the soil will be of vastly more service to society than as crop land whereon a sizable proportion of our farming population struggles in vain to make a decent livelihood.

As to water power, the alternative is to turn it over to private interests for exploitation or to retain it as a public trust for public use. I believe in developing public resources for the benefit of the public and do not see why we should hand them over to someone and tell them to make a profit. Almost all reclamation projects are susceptible of water-power development.

BIG WRITER TO BE BIG RIGHTER

And one more parenthetical word about the Indians. They bring up a conservation problem of a special sort—a matter of human and spiritual values rather than material values entirely.

Creek Indians of the old generation in Oklahoma have a word for the Secretary of the Interior that contains a certain amount of irony. Translated, it means Big Writer. A century and a half of wrongs perseveringly visited upon the Indians have done much that is beyond repair. But as long as I am Big Writer there will be no more thievery of Indian water rights and a dipping into tribal funds for the construction of fancy roads and bridges for white tourists to ride over.

Since 1904 our unreserved and unappropriated public lands have shrunk from 473,000,000 acres to 173,000,000. Much of this vast domain was taken up as farm and cattle-raising homesteads. That a considerable part of it was unsuited for those purposes, the present state of the agricultural proprietor and of the small stock raiser who has tried to make out on a homestead of 640 acres bears conclusive testimony. With all good intentions, the Government has been a party to an unsound business allurement from the effects of which a great many of our citizens have suffered and are suffering. This wrong we propose to correct, making the Government a party to the retirement of poor lands from cultivation and to the voluntary relocation of the people who are trying to cultivate them on better properties.

Moreover, I propose to exert my influence to retain our 173,000,000 acres of public domain, and whatever may be added to it, under the control of the Federal Government, rather than to grant it to the States in which it lies. One school of conservationists favors this latter course. I oppose it because I feel certain that the selfish and short-sighted influences which have done so much to plunder our public domain and bring upon our heads the problems that now vex us would find it much simpler to have their way with State governments than with the National Government. Especially will this be true when the arm of the Federal Government is strengthened by the contemplated reforms which I hope within a few months will have the sanction of law.

The public domain, exclusive of mineral properties, performs an important function in our social and economic scheme. These 173,000,000 acres are situated largely in the 11 Western States of Arizona, California, Colorado, Idaho, Montana, Nevada, New Mexico, Oregon, Utah, Washington, and Wyoming, and these States produce about half of the sheep and one sixth of the cattle that are raised in our country. By a decision of the United States Supreme Court, the public lands are a grazing common for the use of the public.

THE IMPORTANCE OF A BLADE OF GRASS

The Department of the Interior is charged with the administration of these lands, but has very limited authority to control their use. The result has been tragic. Many years ago a member of the Geological Survey contemplated the bleak prospect of a grazing range upon which the very roots had been eaten, and recommended that there be some authority to regulate grazing. He pointed out that without such regulation overgrazing destroyed the cover. Next season one found the grass depleted, and the stock ate out the roots. Then erosion set in, the headwaters of the streams silted up, and there were floods below—all traceable back to overgrazing.

As matters stand now, there is no authority to prevent overgrazing. I can go out with a thousand cattle and pick a range bare of everything that a cow or a steer will eat. You can follow with a herd of sheep. Sheep browse more closely than cattle and they can subsist on a range where cattle will starve. Sheep will eat and tread out the roots of the grass. This situation was the genesis of the great sheep and cattle wars in the early days of the powder-stained West. Animosity between sheepmen and cattlemen is not uncommon today; but instead of shooting it out, as they did in the olden days, they have recourse to the local courts. These courts can determine who shall use the range as between rivals, but they cannot restrict the extent of its use. Thus the fundamental evil of the destruction of the range continues.

The cattlemen, like the oilmen, the coal men, the timbermen, and every one of us who has had anything to do with the utilization of our resources of nature, have played a short-sighted game. We are all tarred with the same stick, and in no quarter of the country have we learned our lesson except when those natural resources have been exhausted or seriously depleted. Why are so many of the leading conservationists easterners? Take President Roosevelt, Gifford Pinchot, T. R., Rexford Tugwell, Henry Morgenthau, Jr.—all are from east of the Appalachians, where the people are now paying so dearly for the acts of their lusty pioneer forbears. Our cattlemen have merely carried on a great American tradition.

It is illegal to fence the national grazing range, but during the war, when it was necessary to overlook a number of precedents and ignore a good many laws, permission was granted to erect fences on parts of the public domain in Arizona and in New Mexico. When the emergency passed, the fences were ordered down. Pressure was brought to bear and the fences stayed where they were, making, in effect, private preserves of the public range. Order has succeeded order, but the fences remain. I have directed that they shall be removed and intend that this order shall be obeyed, even if it means some activity on the part of the United States marshals. I do not anticipate, however, that this will be the case. I feel that we shall soon have a new deal for the public domain that will mean so much for the cattle industry and so much for the country that this small, if vital, issue of the fences will solve itself in the right way.

TRUE CONSERVATION

In 1928 my predecessor in charge of the Department of the Interior obtained authority from Congress to undertake an experiment. Some of the poorest grazing land in Montana lay in the Mizpah River-Pumpkin Creek area in the southeastern part of the State. It had been abused until it hardly was fit for anything. The department obtained permission to segregate 108,000 acres, part of it public domain and part privately owned, but of little use to the owners. This land was withdrawn from grazing and given a rest. Then it was leased to a privately organized association for $20 a section—a section being a square mile, or 640 acres. The association undertook to lease it to cattlemen at $1.25 a head. It put up fences, made water holes, dipping sheds and other improvements; and it regulated grazing. The result after 3 years is that there is twice as much grass in the Mizpah as before, although the carrying capacity has been increased from 3,000 to 5,000 head. Moreover, I have been told that the calves last year weighed on an average 12 pounds more than in any previous year before grazing was regulated on that range.

This is true conservation, which, I repeat, does not mean holding a public resource in idleness, but using it wisely.

The success of the Mizpah River-Pumpkin Creek experiment has brought numerous requests from different parts of the West for permission to form similar associations and work out the grazing problem under Federal supervision on other segments of the public domain. I feel, however, that rather than deal with the matter piecemeal, it would be wiser to deal at one swoop with the whole public domain by giving this department authority to regulate grazing on it, which, as a matter of fact, should have been done many years ago. Accordingly, last March there was presented in the House of Representatives, by Mr. TAYLOR, of Colorado, a bill whose objects were defined in this language: "To stop injury to the public grazing lands by preventing overgrazing and soil deterioration; to provide for their orderly use, improvement, and development; to stabilize the livestock industry upon the public range, and for other purposes."

This bill was prepared in collaboration with the Department of Agriculture and had the benefit of its long experience with this problem. In the national forests, which are under the jurisdiction of the Department of Agriculture, grazing is regulated and there has been no such deterioration of the range as has occurred on the public domain. This bill was passed by the House, but the Senate did not have time to act on it before adjournment. When Congress convenes again in January, this bill will be punctually reintroduced.

The proposed legislation gives the Government an authority over its grazing lands that it should have possessed long ago, and will do for this great domain all and more than has been done in Montana by means of the Mizpah experiment. As drawn, however, the bill contains one serious defect. This is a provision that the act shall be ineffective in any State without the approval of the legislature of that State and further provides that State lands may be lumped with Federal lands in a jointly administered project. I am opposed to this for the same reasons that I am opposed to transfer of our public domain to State control. The local political pressure for a return to the old evils would be a thing not easily resisted. But with this one section amended, I hope, and expect, that this great piece of legislation will be enacted at the coming session of Congress, and I cannot neglect this opportunity to urge my fellow citizens to support it.

To the lay mind, the word "conservation" usually connotes the work that has been done to preserve our forests and to create and maintain our national parks; and this, indeed, is an important aspect of the problem. A forest is the most highly developed of the natural social organizations of the vegetable kingdom, and the most useful. A forest is a community of trees, as a city is a community of human beings, and had there been no forests in this country there would be fewer cities.

JEFFERSON MISSED HIS RECKONING

In a forest there is a struggle for existence, it is true, with each tree fighting to obtain its share of the good things of the universe, but, on the other hand, a forest is a cooperative community in which each tree helps its neighbor and contributes its part to the common protection of the young. A forest perpetuates the richness of its own soil. Its influence on streams averts floods and droughts. It sustains a population of animals and has made large sections of this continent habitable for man, aside from the contributions to man in the form of fuel and building materials. The disappearance of forests has rendered millions of acres of our country so inhospitable to man that wisdom suggests that the residents move out and give this land an opportunity to recruit its life-sustaining powers as a part of the public domain.

Seven eighths of the eight-hundred-odd millions of acres of virgin forest within the bounds of the United States already have been destroyed; and though abuses continue in what remains, the lumbering interests have awakened to the grave nature of affairs. Originally lumbering was centered in the Eastern States. These forests denuded, it moved into the hardwood belt in the Middle States and into the Lake region. Then it went South. Now it is on the Sierra slopes and the Pacific Northwest, which is the last stand. Wasteful lumbering and fires have destroyed these forests, which, with the buoyance of youth, pioneer American enterprise deemed inexhaustible. As thoughtful a man as Thomas Jefferson reckoned that it would take civilization 100 generations to march from the Appalachians to the Pacific. He missed it by 95 generations.

About half of the timber available for lumbering is in private hands and half lies within the Federally-owned and protected national forests. That in private hands supplies 97 percent of the current lumber production. Of late years lumber companies have undertaken reforestation on a large scale.

NATIONAL FOREST ADDITIONS

I am unwilling, however, to intrust the entire problem to private owners. If it had not been for the farseeing and competent administration of our national forests by the Department of Agriculture, the situation would be much worse than it is. There should be large additions to our national forests, which now cover barely one fifth of our possible timber-growing areas. The young men of the Civilian Conservation Corps have in 6 months accomplished as much that will enhance the happiness of coming generations as has been accomplished by all other agencies dealing with reforestation in the past 15 years. They have planted trees on National land, State land, county land, and private land. Nature and time will do the rest. And most people thought that this work was simply an excuse for taking a quarter of a million idle youngsters off the streets.

Moreover, $20,000,000 from the C.C.C. funds have been set aside for the purchase of new lands to be added to the national forests. The National Forest Reservation Commission has in mind the acquisition of approximately 42 tracts, aggregating 7,280,000 acres. This will exhaust the fund. These units are located in 14 States, the westernmost of which is Minnesota. Four of these States—Missouri, Illinois, Kentucky, and Mississippi—now contain no national forests.

In the far West, territory is being added to the national forests under the General Exchange Act by swapping land for land and land for stumpage. No money payments are involved.

The conservation of scenic values is one of the most interesting and worth while of our efforts, and it is a thing that cannot be done by the Federal Government alone. It must reach down to every village and community in the land. Grand Canyon, Yosemite, Glacier Park, Acadia, the Great Smokies—the very names expand the heart. But what would they have meant to us if the Government had not taken them in hand? Private interests will exploit anything. They would put a sign on the Washington Monument if you would let them. How often have you gone through the country and seen a beautiful, majestic bowlder turned into an advertisement?

We are approaching a time when we shall have more leisure. What better use can be made of it than just wandering about, looking at the scenery? Take the range: North in the summer, south in the winter, California at all times. But we must educate our people to a sane use of leisure. For one thing, I hope to see the system of national parks greatly enlarged. There are inspiring, beautiful places in nearly every State in the Union which could be set aside as national parks with profit to all.

They should be joined by great roads. The other day I listened to Senator BYRD, of Virginia, as he sketched his vision of a road a hundred feet wide from the Shenandoah to the Great Smoky National Park. The President amplified the picture. He said he would like to see the road begin at the Canadian border in Vermont and sweep down through the Green Mountains, through the Berkshires, and to the Blue Ridge, joining the Senator's project. This would be a great thing—a great thing for the interior life of our people. There shouldn't be a billboard in sight. The right-of-way should be landscaped and planted like the Bronx River Parkway and contiguous systems leading north from New York City. It costs little to set out trees when a road is built. Then, in 25 years, see what you have.

Suppose that you owned 5 acres. Would you go out and cut down every tree and burn it in the fireplace? We have 5 acres at our place in Winnetka, north of Chicago. When the house was built in 1916, a few trees had to be removed. These filled the cellar with firewood. Since then I have cut down only dead trees and worked up the windfalls, and the cellar is still filled. And I do not have a billboard on the front lawn.

We must get a sense of personal responsibility toward the national resources as a whole. That is all there is to conservation. If we do not, we waste; and if we waste, we find ourselves in the hands of the sheriff, as the coal industry has done.

BUYING BACK A GIFT

Conservation is economy. Consider Chicago. The early fathers were open-handed go-getters. They pressed miles of the beautiful lake front upon a railroad. Our generation is taxing itself hundreds of millions of dollars to get back that lake front. When we cut down a tree that has been a hundred years growing and make a house of it, we think we are being progressive. But, unless steps are taken to replace that tree, another generation will pay a heavy cost for our lack of imagination and of regard for the rights of the other fellow.

One afternoon I got to my home in Winnetka earlier than usual, and while walking about the grounds I found a woman inside the fence filling a market basket with flowers.

I asked her if she was aware that she was on private property.

The inquiry did not disturb her. "Oh", she said, "I thought it would be all right."

That's the trouble. We've always thought it would be all right. We are not woods broke. We see something lovely or useful—and we reach and take it. A century of this, and behold the evils that have followed in its train; depleted timber and mineral resources; depleted ranges, erosion, and floods; millions of acres rendered unfit to support human life decently. Now, what are we going to do—go out and correct these conditions, complex as they have grown, and painful and expensive as readjustment at this late date may be in some of its details, or shall we fold our arms and say that these things are the way of the world and no help can be found for them?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I also request that there shall be published in the RECORD, as a part of my remarks, an article written by a former Member of the House of Representatives from Wyoming, the Hon. Charles E. Winter. I am frank to say that I think Mr. Winter in this article is unnecessarily critical of the Secretary of the Interior, but, nevertheless, the point of view which he expresses is, I think, worthy of the further notice it will receive from publication in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Casper Tribune-Herald, Dec. 31, 1933]

WINTER ARGUES RIGHTS OF PUBLIC LAND STATES IN CHALLENGING POLICIES OF SECRETARY ICKES—"CALL TO ACTION" SOUNDED BY FORMER SOLON IN WARNING AGAINST LAND CONTROL BILL

By Charles E. Winter, former Wyoming Congressman

In a recent issue of a national weekly, Secretary of the Interior Harold I. Ickes, by way of an interview, writes on the subject of the national domain. At the outset, he illustrates the theory upon which the administration justifies the construction of reclamation projects in the West. The illustration reads like the Casper-Alcova project. In a few words the justification stated is that for every acre of good land made productive by irrigation, 5 acres of marginal lands will be retired from occupancy for living purposes and from production. Thus, he brings reclamation in line with the "best use"—which is conservation. With this proposition we have no quarrel. In this connection, however, he states that without this concurrent plan of retirement of marginal lands, meaning poor lands, "there would be no excuse for reclamation" in view of overproduction.

With this statement I must take issue.

First, reclamation by irrigation justifies itself—per se.

Second, the overproduction crops are raised by irrigation; they are consumed on the projects. But the great bulk of crops raised on the projects are special crops of which we not only do not have a surplus but which were imported in the normal years preceding the abnormal years, and the subsequent depression, to the amount of $600,000,000 to $800,000,000 annually. These imported agricultural products can be raised on our projects, and should be raised in the United States.

Third, the honorable Secretary ignores a basic right of the arid States to have their productive resources developed, particularly in view of the fact the States east of the Rocky Mountain States have a hundred percent of their area in production, while the arid States now have an average under cultivated production of only about 3 percent of their area; and when all land in the arid States capable of irrigation is furnished with water, the amount will be but about 5 percent. To this development the arid States are surely entitled, from any standpoint of justice.

Fourth, every irrigation project develops electric power, which is of great value in the creation of new industries by development of mineral resources now dormant. There are imported gypsum, chromium, asbestos, aluminum, potash, and nitrate, all of which we have in the West in the region of power and reclamation projects. The last two, potash and nitrate, with our phosphate, constitute the fertilizer much needed to renew the depleted soil from the Mississippi to the Atlantic. Potash is being imported from France and Germany; nitrate formerly from Chile. A combination of potash and phosphate, plus hydroelectric power for the fixation of nitrates from the air, such as exist in the Green River Valley in Wyoming, for example, is of incalculable value to the whole people of the United States and especially to the eastern half of the country, where the soil must have these elements annually replaced.

But the chief issue I take with the Secretary's article is that portion in which he states his opposition to the plan of ceding the remaining unappropriated public lands, 173,000,000 acres, to the States. He places himself on record for perpetual Federal control, to the exclusion of the people who, under the present land laws, can acquire them. His stated reason for denying to the States their proper jurisdiction and ownership is that "the selfish and short-sighted influences which have done so much to plunder our public domain and bring upon our heads the problems that now vex us would find it much simpler to have their way with State governments than with the National Government."

This charge is a repetition of similar statements emanating from the Atlantic coast and from Government bureaus seeking enlargement and authority, and is based on the destruction or wastage or the giving away by the older States of their lands and natural resources, particularly their forests. I deny the charge against the West, and call for the proof. The Western States were granted and have administered creditably from 2 to 4 school sections in each township. This is fact against an eastern slander. The Western States have administered land-grant college and university lands with integrity and efficiency. If Mr. Ickes is right, then it was a mistake to intrust the States with any lands. Minnesota, Wisconsin, Missouri, and Texas have handled mineral lands retained or granted them in the enabling and annexation acts to the enrichment of those States' educational funds. In 1850 about 64,000,000 acres of swamp land were distributed among the then States, mostly Eastern, some of which, it is said, failed to develop or dissipated these lands without much benefit to the States. It is alleged that the Appalachian States, then the Great Lakes and the Southern States, permitted all their forests to be cut down and did not replant. If all these charges are true, they afford no basis whatever for a conviction and condemnation of the Western States in this day and age. In the same paragraph with a criticism of the northwest Pacific coast States for rapidly cutting their timber, the Secretary admits that even the private owners of timber there are replanting their cut-over areas. * * *

As against the arraignment of the Secretary, I contrast the position of the deceased United States Senators, John B. Kendrick, of Wyoming, and Thomas J. Walsh, of Montana, both of whom came to the opposite conclusion and had bills pending in the Senate at the time of their deaths to cede the remaining public lands and their resources to the States. A host of other men and women, prominent nationally, have taken the same position, including 22 members of a commission appointed from all parts of the Union, who made a report after an investigation and study over a period of a year and a half recommending that Congress cede the unappropriated lands to the States. Their conclusion and reason was that the States are in a better position to, could, and would conserve the lands better than the Federal Government. Twenty-two Governors, all who were in attendance at a conference in Salt Lake City, petitioned Congress to cede the public lands to the States.

The arid States and their people know better than any Eastern State or people possibly could the value and necessity of conserving the land, the range, the forests, and the water which constitute the bases of their material wealth and prosperity. If there ever was a time when they would have destroyed these resources—and there was not—that time has long since passed.

The honorable Secretary picks out certain notables east of the Appalachian Range as being the outstanding conservationists, thereby intimating that the West has none. Let these illustrious conservers and reformers restore the depletion in the East that occurred before the era of conservation. The West will take care of its own.

When I say "its own", I speak advisedy. The Constitution and the policy of this Government never contemplated or intended that the Federal Government should forever govern the lands within the States. The Federal Government is a trustee under the treaties whereby we received these lands from other nations. The trust should be closed. The Government has now permanently reserved, as trustee, to itself 235,000,000 acres of forests, minerals, and water-power sites—the richest lands in the 11 Western States. This constitutes 30 percent of their entire area. Now the Secretary proposes to so legislate as to permanently retain the Federal grip on the balance of the public land—173,000,000 acres—a total of 408,000,000 acres, which is 55 percent of the total area of these States. There is already an anomolous condition contrary to the genius of our institutions. With the new proposal added, it is grotesque. The American system contemplates that the area within a State shall eventually come to the ownership of the State or its people. Just as it came to the people of Indiana, Ohio, Illinois, Iowa, and Nebraska in the march of the States westward under the national plan. I make exception of the national parks, which should be Federal.

In the case of Pollard v. Hagans the Supreme Court of the United States said:

"We will now inquire into the nature and extent of the right of the United States to these lands. This right originated in voluntary surrenders made by several of the old States under a resolution of the old Congress, of the 6th of September 1780, recommending such surrender and cession, to aid in paying the public debt incurred by the War of the Revolution. The object of all the parties to these contracts of cession was to convert the land into money for the payment of the debt and to erect new States over the territory thus ceded; and as soon as these purposes could be accomplished the power of the United States over these lands as property was to cease."

The decision pertained to lands east of the Mississippi, which, as stated, had been conveyed to the United States by the Thirteen Original Colonies. But the policy is true of the States west of the Mississippi as well, even though these areas were ceded direct to the United States by the foreign nations. The treaties under which they were acquired provided to the same end—the erection of sovereign States on equal terms with the original States. This fact was recognized, hence the provision in the constitutions of the new Western States that the people of the State "disclaim all right and title to the unappropriated public lands." These States were required to so provide to gain admission. The legal status has been determined by the United States Supreme Court in favor of the Federal Government as against the States. But we are now addressing ourselves to a policy to be determined by the Congress under its authority provided in article IV, section 3, of the Constitution: "Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needed rules and regulations relative to the territory or other property belonging to the United States." The Revolutionary War debt was paid by 1836. This was done by the General Government, as trustee, from the proceeds of public lands, for the benefit of all the people. But being paid, there was but one object of the trust left—the creation of sovereign States over the new areas; and the people of these States were and are the beneficiaries of the trust. It is time now to close the trust and bring about the condition described by the Supreme Court in the above case:

"Whenever the United States shall have fully executed these trusts the municipal sovereignty or the new States will be complete throughout their respective boundaries, and they and the original States will be upon an equal footing in all respects whatever."

Under the system of reservations or any system of control which prevents the acquisition of the public lands by the State or its citizens the Western States will never be upon an equal footing with the rest of the States.

The Court further states, as quoted:

"As soon as these purposes (payment of the Revolutionary debt and creation of sovereign States) could be accomplished the power of the United States over the lands as property was to cease."

The debt is paid, the sovereign States have been created; so let the power cease. Let the trust be closed. Let the States or their citizens have their land within their borders and jurisdiction over it. Under the Secretary's plan, the Western States will be forever denied that "equal footing" with the other States, which have come, or their people have come, into ownership and jurisdiction over all the land within their borders.

Partial returns of the proceeds of these lands to the States cannot justify the permanent retention of them by the Government. The States are entitled to a hundred percent of such proceeds and to the jurisdiction and administration of them as a matter of primary political right and principle.

As a practical proposition, any system to regulate the range should include the State lands as they are scattered through and are contiguous to the scattered parcels of the Federal land. But Mr. Ickes refuses to agree that there shall be any joint management because he distrusts the States. He is even opposed to the passage of the Federal control bill he advocates, as written, because it contains a provision that it shall be effective only in such States whose legislatures will accept such a change in our land policy. He says:

"The bill as drawn contains one serious defect. This is a provision that the act shall be ineffective in any State without the approval of the legislature of that State, and further provides that State land may be lumped with Federal lands with a jointly administered project. I am opposed to this for the same reason that I am opposed to the transfer of the public domain to State control. The local political pressure for a return to the old evils would be a thing not easily resisted."

What evils? And why would any State bring about or permit the return of any evils? Was every prior Congress and President mistaken and encouraging "evils" when they granted to all the States a total of 202,000,000 acres upon or after their admission? The Secretary's State of Illinois was granted 3,600,000 acres. Did it waste theirs? Mr. Ickes' position condemns the United States and the policy of this Government through a hundred years. The Western States, according to his theory, are either so inefficient or so dishonest that their legislatures, executives, and land officers will somehow waste, destroy, or give away for exploitation at the behest of "influences" their own lands, waters, forests, and minerals. The Western States have proven the contrary.

In the past year the people, for whom the National and State Governments exist, homesteaded over 3,000,000 acres under the homestead law provided by Congress in 1862 under which the West from the Mississippi has been peopled and carved into independent, sovereign States. In the year preceding that they filed on more than 4,000,000 acres. Mr. Ickes presumes to say that they should not do so and proposes to fix things so they cannot, and this at a time when it is a Government policy to direct the people "back to the land." He states the land will not support them. The same thing was said of the States of Nebraska and Kansas, once denominated a part of "the Great American Desert" in our geographies. The bill in Congress favored by the Secretary will stop all homesteading or acquisition of public land by purchase. The homesteaders endure hardships, yes. Especially in this time of depression when farmers on old settled farms in Midwestern States cannot make ends meet. So did the homesteaders in Mr. Ickes' State of Illinois, and of Iowa. The early settlers of Nebraska and Kansas were driven out by failure but either they, returning, or the second or third set of homesteaders stuck and developed great States. However, I concede that the land now left is the poorest, the best having been taken, and that 640 acres does not afford a living.

But whether the remaining lands can afford a living by stock grazing and some crop production on 640 acres, which could quickly be enlarged to 1,280, is not after all the real question. The point is that these lands should come into private ownership by homesteading or by sale. The Ickes plan would make this forever impossible. State ownership would continue the possibility through a State homestead law as to such tracts as are capable of furnishing a living and sale of all the rest; and in the meantime lease and regulate. Sale price should be not more than $1 per acre, long-term payment. These lands, once in private ownership, would automatically find their best use under economic laws, whether crop-growing land or grazing land. They will be conserved and developed, for a man takes care of his own. Under private ownership the land would be on the tax rolls and help to sustain the State as they should. Under Federal ownership they are not taxable. The State suffers thereby. Under State or private ownership they are where they belong—in the jurisdiction of the State.

The Federal Government should be satisfied with its excessive power and jurisdiction over 30 percent of the entire area of our Western States forever denying to the people ownership or State ownership and paying no taxes, and not now seek to retain permanently 25 percent more of all the remaining public land. The Constitution forbids the creation of another State within a State. Article IV, section 3, "no new State shall be formed or created within the jurisdiction of any other State." The Federal Government, by permanently reserving and retaining 55 percent as proposed, or 30 percent as now, when it is, under the Constitution and the international treaties under which these lands were acquired from other nations, a trustee to "dispose of" them for the erection of sovereign, independent States on an equal footing with the Thirteen Original States (which retained all their public lands within their borders) is in effect erecting another State within a State.

This whole idea of great reservations and great areas under perpetual Federal control is centralization gone mad. It out-Herods Herod, out-Hamiltons Hamilton, and out-Marshalls Marshall. As for Jefferson, the patron saint of the party to which the Secretary belongs, what becomes of our dual form of government, the rights of the States and individuals, for which Jefferson stood, that balanced structure of government provided by the Constitution—Federal and State? What has become of that Jeffersonian basic American principle, "That government is best which governs least"?

The Secretary asks the people to support him and the legislation which he advocates, the Federal Control Land Act, the Taylor bill referred to, amended so as to strike out the last vestige of State rights. I am convinced that western Representatives in the House made a grave mistake in passing the Taylor bill. They number but 35 Members out of 435, hence the bill is an eastern bill; but a united front by them would have prevented the passage of the bill, which reduces the Western States in principle and practice to the status of dependencies and provinces. They surrendered a vital right of a State in our form of government. The Senate Members should be wiser. I plead for and hope my fellow citizens everywhere believing in our political structure will unite in the preservation of that structure and resist the Federal land control bill, pending in Congress, which dooms the remaining lands forever to the status of a Federal pasture, with a host of Federal agents, rules, and regulations, under an enormous expense, denying the States their rightful jurisdiction and the individual the right to buy the land. I trust they will support those other bills introduced and advocated by former Senators Kendrick and Walsh, who were members of the Senate Public Lands Committee. These will cede the remaining lands and their minerals to the States and do them partial justice. The people will still have an opportunity to acquire lands into private ownership and thus bring them into development, taxation, and the best conservation. Thus they will help to support the State in whose boundaries they lie, which is their proper destiny and duty.

I am warning the livestock industry of the West, which is naturally the most vitally affected, that if they do not at once take action through their Governors and their Federal representatives at Washington the Taylor bill, passed in the House, may be a law before they know it. The livestock grower, above all others, is interested, in such disposition, in the right to purchase and acquire the lands in private ownership. But all of the western people have the broad interest of maintaining a right and principle never before denied the American citizen, a right belonging to the States, which should be fought for as a fundamental policy of our form of government. This is a call to action.

I retain the hope that the proposition laid down by the Secretary does not represent his or President Roosevelt's final opinion, and that they will give further study to the question of the disposition of the remaining public lands.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED

The bill (H.R. 6976) to protect the currency system of the United States, to provide for the better use of the monetary gold stock of the United States, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

AMENDMENT TO FEDERAL CREDIT UNION BILL

Mr. SHEPPARD submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 1639) to establish a Federal Credit Union System, to establish a further market for securities of the United States, and to make more available to people of small means credit for provident purposes through a national system of cooperative credit, thereby helping to stabilize the credit structure of the United States, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENTS TO INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. HATFIELD submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to House bill 6663, the independent offices appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed, as follows:

In the third paragraph of section 22, after the word "promotions", to insert: "provided that adjustments of charges for quarters, subsistence or laundry, or other similar charges, shall not be interpreted as constituting administrative promotions."

Mr. DIETERICH submitted amendments intended to be proposed by him to House bill 6663, the independent offices appropriation bill, which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed, as follows:

On page 23, line 23, in lieu of the amount "$76,649,907", insert "$77,149,907."

On page 26, line 21, to insert the following:

"Provided further, That when veterans who are eligible for hospital treatment or domiciliary care suffering from neuropsychiatric ailments are cared for and maintained in State institutions it shall be the duty of the Administrator, when found to be in the best interest of the United States, subject to the general direction of the President, to contract with the State, or in exceptional cases, with private hospitals, for such medical, surgical, and hospital services and supplies as may be required for such purposes, provided that such hospital facilities as may hereafter be contracted for hereunder shall be regarded for the purposes of this act, as within the limits of existing Veterans' Administration facilities."

REFINANCING OF FARM DEBTS—AMENDMENT

Mr. CONNALLY. I send to the desk an amendment which, at a later stage of the proceedings, I propose to offer to House bill 6670, and ask that it may lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be received and lie on the table.

FEDERAL HOME LOAN BANKING CORPORATION

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I have asked recognition at this time for the purpose of submitting a privileged resolution for which I ask immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S.Res. 148), as follows:

Resolved, That the Federal Home Loan Bank Board be, and is hereby, directed to furnish the Senate the following information concerning the operations of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation:

1. The number and location of State and district agencies (including the District of Columbia) of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation.

2. The number and location of branches and branch agencies in each State employing salaried representatives.

3. The number of salaried employees of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation in each State, listed by States, including salaried employees or agents in branches or branch agencies, and the total amount expended in each State by the Home Owners' Loan Corporation for personal services, traveling expenses, and office expenses, from the date of the creation of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation.

4. The number of applications for loans received by each of the several State agencies, listed by States; the number of loans which have been closed in each State; the total amount of the loans closed in each State, whether cash loans or closed through the issuance of bonds, and segregated so as to show the total amount of cash loans and those closed by the exchange of bonds of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation for mortgages or other liens on homes.

5. The total number of employees, by States of residence, employed in the central office of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation in Washington, and the total amount paid for personal services, traveling expenses, and office expenses by the central office of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation since the approval of Public, No. 43.

6. The total number and amount of applications for loans finally rejected by the Home Owners' Loan Corporation or its branches, by States.

7. The amount of the capital stock of the Corporation subscribed by the Secretary of the Treasury on behalf of the United States, as provided in subsection B of section 4 of Public, No. 43.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, upon hearing the resolution read, no objection suggests itself to me unless it be that there appears to be no date fixed in the resolution as of which the information called for shall be furnished.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield.

Mr. DILL. This is rather an elaborate resolution. I had no knowledge of it until I just heard it read. I wish the Senator from Georgia would let it go over until tomorrow. I should like to suggest one or two amendments to it.

Mr. RUSSELL. I hope the Senator from Washington will not insist on his request.

Mr. DILL. Will the Senator let it go over until later in the day so that I may have an opportunity to examine it carefully?

Mr. RUSSELL. I addressed a letter on the subject to the Corporation under date of December 22, 1933, and ever since then I have been endeavoring to secure this information, which is very simple and should be immediately available. Nothing is sought in the resolution that could possibly injure the Corporation by becoming public, but there are some facts sought which would be most interesting to those of us who have great faith in the Home Owners' Loan Corporation and the purposes it has in view. I shall not object to the resolution's going over for the time being, but I should like to have it considered during the day.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. As I have just pointed out, there appears to be no date fixed in the resolution as of which the information called for shall be furnished. Necessarily some date must be prescribed, at least it would seem so to me, as the Home Owners' Loan Corporation is proceeding daily to make loans. I suggest to the Senator from Georgia that perhaps later in the day or certainly tomorrow the resolution may receive favorable consideration. The information called for is without doubt valuable and should be made available.

Mr. RUSSELL. There is no information sought that the Corporation should not be able to give as of the close of any day's business. I am perfectly willing to fix any date, such as December 31, 1933, or January 1, 1934, that may appeal to the Senator from Arkansas as being just and fair to the Corporation.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. It would seem to me that the nearer down to date the information can be brought the more helpful it will be. I shall ask that the resolution go over for the present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will go over.

THE PLATT AMENDMENT AND THE GOVERNMENT OF CUBA

Mr. KING. I submit a resolution which I ask may be read and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The resolution (S.Res. 150) was read and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, as follows:

Whereas, by the treaty of peace entered into between the United States and the Kingdom of Spain on April 11, 1899, the Kingdom of Spain relinquished all sovereignty over and title to the island of Cuba; and

Whereas the Congress subsequently, on March 2, 1901, incorporated in the act approved on that date, entitled "An act making appropriation for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1902", the so-called "Platt amendment", imposing certain conditions on the people of the island of Cuba in consideration of the relinquishment to them by the United States of the government and control of the island; and

Whereas the existing situation between the United States Government and the Republic of Cuba is such as to require a reexamination of the circumstances surrounding the adoption of the Platt amendment: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized and directed to examine into the circumstances surrounding the adoption of the so-called "Platt amendment" and the subsequent incorporation of its requirements into the Constitution of the Republic of Cuba, and to determine (1) whether or not existing conditions justify the repeal of such amendment and the complete relinquishment to the people of the island of Cuba of the government and control of such island, and also (2) whether conditions now existing in Cuba do not warrant the Government of the United States recognizing the existing government of the island of Cuba. The committee shall report to the Senate, as soon as practicable, the results of its examination, together with its recommendations.

For the purposes of this resolution, the committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to hold such hearings, to sit and act at such times and places during the sessions and recesses of the Senate in the Seventy-third Congress, to employ such clerical and other assistants, to require, by subpena or otherwise, the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths, to take such testimony, and to make such expenditures as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic services to report such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words. The expenses of the committee, which shall not exceed $———, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman.

INFORMATION CONCERNING CERTAIN GOVERNMENTAL CORPORATIONS

Mr. STEIWER submitted a resolution (S.Res. 151), which was ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

Whereas it appears that certain corporations have been set up by various agencies of the United States Government in connection with the administration of acts of Congress, and among others the following:

Federal Surplus Relief Corporation, in connection with the administration of the Agricultural Adjustment Act and the Federal Emergency Relief Act of 1933;

Commodity Credit Corporation, in connection with the administration of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, and the Executive order reorganizing agricultural credit agencies of the United States, dated March 27, 1933;

Federal Emergency Housing Corporation, in connection with the administration of title II of the National Industrial Recovery Act;

Electric Home and Farm Authority, Inc., in connection with the administration of the Tennessee Valley Authority Act of 1933; and

Whereas detailed information with respect to the organization of such corporations is not available to the Members of Congress, and no reports have been made concerning the operations of any of such corporations; and

Whereas no act of Congress specifically authorized the organization of any of such corporations: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the several agencies of the United States Government having supervision over the operations of the corporations named above are hereby requested to transmit to the Senate, at the earliest practicable date, a statement showing (1) the authority for the organization of the corporations in connection with the administration of such agencies; (2) the functions performed or intended to be performed by such corporations; (3) the amount of money, if any, which has been received and expended by such corporations, together with a general statement of the sources of all receipts and the purposes for which the money has been expended; (4) the number of officers and employees of such corporations and the salary received by each officer or employee, together with copies of the articles of incorporation, bylaws, and other pertinent matter relating to the incorporation of such corporations.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES—COMMITTEE ON AERONAUTICS AND AVIATION

Mr. McCARRAN. I ask permission to submit a resolution calling for an amendment to rule XXV of the Senate rules.

In this connection I wish to state that the disclosures before the Special Investigating Committee of the Senate on Air Mail have developed a condition which, in my judgment and in the judgment of members of the committee, deserves special consideration of an amendment to the Senate rules for the purpose of creating a new standing committee of the Senate, to be known as the "Committee on Aeronautics and Aviation."

I ask that the resolution take the regular order and go to the Committee on Rules.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The resolution (S.Res. 152) was read and referred to the Committee on Rules, as follows:

Resolved, That rule XXV of the Standing Rules of the Senate be and the same is hereby amended by inserting on page 30, after the third line of paragraph No. 1, the following: "Committee on Aeronautics and Aviation, to consist of 12 Senators."

FUNDS FOR SLUM-CLEARANCE PROJECTS

Mr. LOGAN. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter written to the Federal Emergency Administrator of Public Works, by the Comptroller General, relating to the question of allocating the funds for slum-clearance projects. I ask that this be done, and some time later, I think, I shall want to make a few remarks about the contents of the letter and kindred matters.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COMPTROLLER GENERAL OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, January 11, 1934.

FEDERAL EMERGENCY ADMINISTRATOR OF PUBLIC WORKS.

SIR: There have been submitted for my countersignature miscellaneous civil ledger transfer appropriation warrants nos. 330 and 332, proposing to transfer funds under the appropriation account "National Industrial Recovery, 1933–35" to an appropriation account entitled "National Industrial Recovery, Public Works Emergency Housing Corporation, 1933–35." The first warrant covers an allotment of $1,000 stated in your letter of December 21, 1933, to be for the purchase and payment of the initial capital stock of the Public Works Emergency Housing Corporation, in accordance with the resolution of the Special Board for Public Works, dated November 21, 1933. The second warrant proposes to transfer the sum of $100,000,000, which amount it is stated in your letter of December 26, 1933, requesting the transfer, is for the construction by the Corporation of low-cost housing and slum-clearance projects to be selected and undertaken by it, and the acquisition of any real or personal property in connection therewith, in accordance with the resolution of the Special Board for Public Works, dated November 21, 1933.

The resolution of the Special Board relative to the allotment of $1,000, as shown by an unauthenticated copy submitted with the warrant, is as follows:

"Resolved, That the Administrator and Board allot and transfer the sum of $1,000 for the purchase and payment of the initial capital stock of Public Works Emergency Housing Corporation, and that such sum be available to the Corporation for the payment of the necessary organization and incidental expenditures incurred by it."

With respect to the allotment of $100,000,000, the resolution of the Board, an unauthenticated copy of which also has been furnished, provides:

"Whereas the Director of Housing and the Board of Directors of the Public Works Emergency Housing Corporation, by resolution duly adopted, recommend the allotment and transfer of $100,000,000 to the Public Works Emergency Housing Corporation for the construction by the Corporation of low-cost housing and slum-clearance projects to be selected and undertaken by it, and the acquisition of any real or personal property in connection therewith.

"Resolved, That the Administrator and the Board include such low-cost housing and slum-clearance projects in the comprehensive program, and allot and transfer $100,000,000 to the Public Works Emergency Housing Corporation for the construction of such projects to be selected and undertaken by it, and the acquisition of any real or personal property in connection therewith.

"Resolved further, That Public Works Emergency Housing Corporation is hereby authorized to proceed in and about the selection, and the construction of such projects, and the acquisition of any real or personal property in connection therewith, and to do any and all things necessary or suitable to that end, in such manner and upon such terms and conditions as the Administrator may approve and direct: Provided, That the selection of the specific projects to be undertaken by Public Works Emergency Housing Corporation be approved by the Administrator, that the plans and specifications therefor be satisfactory to the Administrator, that the cost of the land to be acquired therefor be satisfactory to the Administrator, and that the funds hereinabove allocated to the Corporation for such projects be made available to it only when and as approved by the Administrator."

By Executive Order No. 6470 of November 29, 1933, the President designated and established the Public Works Emergency Housing Corporation as an agency under title II of the National Industrial Recovery Act of June 16, 1933, with the powers and for the purposes as set forth in said Executive order, as follows:

"(2) The Housing Corporation is authorized and empowered to construct, finance, or aid in the construction or financing of any public-works project included in the program prepared pursuant to section 202 (d) of said act.

"(3) The Housing Corporation is authorized and empowered to acquire by purchase, or by exercise of the power of eminent domain, any real or personal property in connection with the construction of any such project.

"(4) The Housing Corporation is authorized and empowered to sell any security acquired or any property so constructed or acquired or to lease any such property with or without the privilege of purchase: Provided, That all moneys received by the Housing Corporation from any such sale or lease shall be applied in the manner provided in section 203 of said act.

"(5) The Housing Corporation is authorized and empowered to take any and all such action, do any and all such things, and exercise any and all such powers as may be or appear necessary, suitable, or expedient in connection with the foregoing."

The Corporation was organized under the laws of the State of Delaware, the incorporators being the Federal Emergency Administrator of Public Works, the Director of the Housing Division, and the Secretary of Labor. The nature of the business of the Corporation is set forth in the amended articles of incorporation filed under date of November 21, 1933, with the secretary of state, State of Delaware, in which it is provided generally, among other things, that the Corporation, which is to have perpetual existence, is authorized to act as an agency of the United States and/or the Federal Emergency Administrator of Public Works or other duly designated representative of the United States in carrying out the provisions and effectuating the purposes of title II of the National Industrial Recovery Act, and to take any and all such action, do any and all such things, and perform such functions and exercise such powers in connection with the same as may be delegated or assigned to, or conferred upon, the Corporation by the President of the United States, or the Federal Emergency Administrator of Public Works, or a duly designated representative of the United States. Among the specific things which the articles of incorporation would permit the Corporation to do are the following:

1. To reconstruct, etc., low-cost housing and slum-clearance projects of every kind, nature, or description, and buildings and structures of every kind, nature, or description.

2. To acquire improved or unimproved real estate and any and all buildings thereon or appurtenances thereto, by purchase, exchange, exercise of the power of eminent domain, or otherwise.

3. To manufacture, buy, sell, and otherwise produce and deal in and with building and other materials and other supplies.

4. To conduct and carry on the business of building and construction in all of its phases and without limitation.

5. To perform any and all acts and functions customarily done or performed by architects, engineers, and contractors.

6. To furnish, equip, operate, manage, and maintain public-works projects and buildings and structures of every kind, nature, and description.

In addition to the foregoing and other further powers, it is also provided in paragraph 13 of article 3 of the articles of incorporation that the Corporation is authorized to borrow money for its corporate purposes without limit as to amount and, in connection therewith, to draw, make, accept, endorse, and issue promissory notes, bills of exchange, bonds, debentures, and other instruments and evidences of indebtedness, and, also, in paragraph 14, to carry out all or any part of the objects, purposes, and powers specified in article 3 as principal, agent, or otherwise, either alone or in association with any other corporation or any person, firm, association, or government or subdivision thereof, and to do such acts and things as a natural person could lawfully do or exercise.

The National Industrial Recovery Act of June 16, 1933, provided, in section 202, that the Administrator, under the direction of the President, should prepare a comprehensive program of public works which should include, among other things, the construction, reconstruction, alteration, or repair under public regulation or control of low-cost housing and slum-clearance projects, and in section 203 it is provided that with a view to increasing employment quickly the President is authorized and empowered, through the Administrator or through such other agencies as he may designate or create, to construct, finance, or aid in the constructing or financing of any public-works project included in the program prepared pursuant to section 202.

Under the provisions of this law, it is apparent that the carrying out of low-cost housing and slum-clearance projects would be for consideration primarily by the Federal Emergency Administrator of Public Works, and the moneys made available to carry out the projects authorized to be undertaken under the National Recovery Act are appropriated moneys.

The creation of a corporation involves organization and other expense—not necessarily great, but which amount, in this instance, might be otherwise beneficially employed, as it must come from the appropriation for carrying out the provisions of the National Industrial Recovery Act, and should be avoided as unnecessary unless clearly in the public interest.

In view of the things stipulated as authorized in the basic law and the much wider authority outlined in the articles of incorporation, it seems probable there exists a misunderstanding and that an agency in corporate form was determined upon in the belief that through creating a corporation and transferring appropriated moneys thereto such moneys would lose their appropriation status and become available for uses otherwise prohibited by law. Such is not the case, as appropriated moneys remain appropriated moneys no matter where lodged and their uses are prescribed accordingly.

There is a clear and vital difference between a corporation created pursuant to statutory direction with clear statutory grant to remove its transactions from the safeguards surrounding appropriations and to avoid not only Executive direction but accountability for the public moneys intrusted to it, and a corporation created within the Government under an authority to use existing and to create additional agencies to assist in administering a law, and which operates with appropriated moneys. In some instances, it is true, the laws creating corporations have been so broad as to exclude Executive control and permit escape from accountability. A corporation of the other class, however, created as an additional administrative agency, can have no such status or uncontrolled authority. It can exercise no wider authority than as though operating as an unincorporated unit in the executive branch. By the act of incorporating Executive responsibility is not shifted, Executive control avoided, nor accountability escaped.

While there is room for doubt that the authority given by the National Industrial Recovery Act to create additional agencies was intended to authorize the creating of corporations, this office, wishing to avoid placing any unnecessary restraint upon those administering the law has felt justified in withholding objection thereto where there seemed no serious danger involved.

In the instant matter, however, inasmuch as the powers and authority outlined in the articles of incorporation appear to contemplate operations beyond statutory authority, and which condition, unless rectified in advance of operations, may lead to the incurring of obligations which may not lawfully be paid from the appropriation, it seems highly desirable that these things be now brought to attention in order that they may be worked out before there is opportunity for serious complications.

The statutory authority and limitations in the matter appear clear to the President, as evidenced by his order of November 29, 1933.

There appears for consideration also the matter of incorporating a Government agency without specific statutory authority in a jurisdiction outside the seat of the Federal Government and subject to State laws, possibly also subjecting a Government agency and Government property to State taxation.

In addition to excessive corporate powers there is noted that the corporate term (perpetual) appears in conflict with section 201 (d) of the Recovery Act, and that the plan of action probably conflicts with the proviso in section 203 (a) (3) of said act.

Then, too, inasmuch as there apparently will be involved the acquiring of real estate through purchase and possibly condemnation, and conveyancing thereof, there is suggested for consideration whether there may not arise questions, with possibly confusion and delays resulting, in matters of taking and conveying title, and in prosecuting condemnation proceedings, if operations are conducted otherwise than by a statutory official of the Government.

In view of the doubtful matters appearing this office, on the present record, does not feel justified in countersigning the warrants as submitted and they will be held pending further advices from you showing the legality of the course proposed or such alteration thereof as may be necessary.

Respectfully,

J. R. McCARL,
Comptroller General of the United States.

EMPLOYMENT STATISTICS

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I ask the attention of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

On January 15 the Senator from Ohio submitted a resolution requesting some statistics as to unemployment. The resolution was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor. The Committee on Education and Labor have given consideration to the resolution and report it favorably; and I now ask that action thereon be considered by the Senate.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Let the resolution be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The resolution (S.Res. 138) submitted by Mr. FESS on the 15th instant was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of Labor is requested to furnish to the Senate at the earliest practicable date the following information: (1) The number of persons employed during the month of November 1929, the month of November 1932, the month of November 1933, and, so far as available, the month of January 1934, in producing capital or durable goods, and the number employed in producing consumptive goods; (2) the number of persons employed during the same periods in producing all types of goods, and the number employed in furnishing services; (3) the number of persons employed during the same periods in private industry and on private enterprises, and the number employed on emergency public or semipublic enterprises; and (4) so far as possible, the extent of the unemployment during the same periods in each category set forth above.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, the resolution was submitted to the Commissioner of Labor Statistics, who has transmitted to me a letter showing that it will be impossible to furnish all the information called for by the resolution, but outlining such information as is available. I ask that this letter be printed in the RECORD, and that the resolution be approved by the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the letter will be printed in the RECORD.

The letter is as follows:

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF LABOR, BUREAU OF LABOR STATISTICS,
Washington, January 18, 1934.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
United States Senate, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR SENATOR WALSH: The Secretary of Labor has referred to me Senate Resolution No. 138, in which the Secretary is requested to furnish to the Senate certain information regarding employment.

Treating the various parts of the resolution seriatim, I wish to inform you that—

(1) Data are available showing the number of persons employed in November 1929, 1932, and 1933 for the manufacturing industries of the country and for certain nonmanufacturing industries. Without any great effort, the Bureau of Labor Statistics could furnish figures showing the number of employed in the durable goods industries and the consumption goods industries.

(2) Data showing the number of persons employed producing all types of goods are also available. There is no authoritative figure available showing the number of employed in the so-called "service industries." Estimates could be furnished for six or seven of the more important service industries, such as laundries, dye and cleaning establishments, hotels, etc.

(3) No data are available showing the number of persons employed on all public and semipublic emergency enterprises. We have figures for such work as is financed with funds appropriated by the Federal Government. Nothing is available to show the number employed on emergency work financed entirely by States or municipalities.

(4) No authoritative figures are available on unemployment. Such estimates as prevail vary rather markedly, and none of them show the extent of unemployment in the capital goods industries as opposed to the consumption goods industries.

It would be possible to secure the material that is not already available, but a considerable amount of time and the employment of a fairly large staff would be required.

We shall be most pleased to furnish to the Senate such material as already is available upon receipt of word from you.

Very cordially yours,

ISADOR LUBIN,
Commissioner of Labor Statistics.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the resolution was considered by the Senate and agreed to.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The reports will be placed on the Executive Calendar.

STUDIES OF THE GREAT LAKES-ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY (S.DOC. NO. 116, PT. 2)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which was read, as follows:

To the Senate:

I transmit herewith for the information of the Senate report on the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence project, with appendixes, prepared in the Department of Commerce.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 22, 1934.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the message and reports accompanying the message of the President be printed as a Senate document, together with the illustrations, for the benefit of the Senate, and that they lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I was interrupted for a moment, and I did not hear the request of the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. PITTMAN. Accompanying the message of the President just laid before the Senate are certain reports. One is a report of the Department of Commerce on the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence project, submitted January 6, 1934, and the other is a report from the same Department of the same date with appendixes.

Mr. NORRIS. What was the Senator's request?

Mr. PITTMAN. I requested that they be printed for the information of the Senate, and that thereafter the message and documents lie on the table.

Mr. NORRIS. I have no objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

CONSIDERATION OF CERTAIN SENATE RESOLUTIONS

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] if he would object to calling up at this time Senate Resolutions 132, 133, 134, 135, and 136?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I believe it will be better to take an adjournment either today or in the immediate future in order that business of the character to which the Senator refers may be taken up during the morning hour.

Mr. DICKINSON. Very well.

THE N.R.A.—ARTICLE BY FRANK R. KENT

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article entitled "The Great Game of Politics", by Frank R. Kent, which appeared in yesterday's Baltimore Sun.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Baltimore Sun, Jan. 21, 1934]

THE GREAT GAME OF POLITICS—GRACE MEANT WELL

By Frank R. Kent

WASHINGTON, January 20.—It seems the time has arrived when those who love Gen. Hugh S. Johnson ought to take him somewhere, calm him down, and cool him off. The suggestion is made in all friendliness. The man can not last at the pace he is going. He ought to take a rest, get rid of his hair shirts, relax, cultivate tolerance and urbanity.

Every week or so he takes on a new feud. Everything seems personal with him. He is so constituted that he sees in everyone who fails to concede the perfection of the N.R.A. and the sheer grandeur of its purpose an unmitigated villain, devoid of honor, and destitute of shame. This is an unfortunate state of mind and keeps the general in an upset condition not conducive to clear thinking and competent work. It might not be so bad if the general got the better of these personal encounters, but he consistently gets the worst of them. One after the other he loses the bouts on points.

There was, among the first, his engagement with Henry Ford, whom he "cracked down" on with the mailed fist of a Government boycott, but with a resulting damage greater to the mailed fist than to Mr. Ford, who won all along the line. Weeks followed when General Johnson had no particular individual to use as a chopping block but swung around the country lumping all the critics of the N.R.A. together as "witch doctors", "tom-tom beaters", "corporals of disaster." The steady stream of his invectives made first-page news but didn't drown the critics. Not long ago he clashed with Mr. Hopkins, head of the C.W.A., over the wages paid by that department. The general was right, but he did not win. The President, it was reliably reported, sustained Mr. Hopkins. For some time the general has been at odds with Secretary Ickes over the public-utility code and other things.

Now he has taken on Senators BORAH and NYE. Neither Senator realized it was a fight until the general sprang upon them. They were concerned over complaints of small business men about the plight in which the monopolistic tendency of certain codes places them, and the great advantage given big business. They had talked this over with the President and General Johnson and thought the general open-minded on the issue. It was a surprise to them when he sank his tigerish teeth in their necks. Described by the Associated Press as sweating profusely, on Thursday night he vehemently denounced them. He accused them of trying to "kill the recovery program", called them "dialecticians", who preferred to see evil rather than help good, intimated they ought to stop talking. He pounded the table, worked in some new stuff about the Angel of Death and generally gave the Senators hell.

Naturally, they resented it; struck back pretty hard. The prevailing opinion is, this is another bout the general is scheduled to lose. Not many deny there is truth in the points made by the Senators, and merit in the complaints of the small dealer. Other Senators agree with Mr. BORAH and Mr. NYE. As a result, the Senate disposition now is to go further in the way of restoring vitality to the antitrust laws than before the general's assault. It will tax heavily the President's powers of persuasion to keep the act from emasculation. Nor has General Johnson's excited denial that the N.R.A. favors big business been rendered more convincing by the enthusiastic endorsement this morning of Mr. Eugene Grace, head of the Bethlehem Steel Co. In a magazine article Mr. Grace speaks with glowing approval of what the N.R.A. has done for industry. The steel business, he says, has been tremendously benefited by suspension of the antitrust laws and the elimination of competition. He generously applauds the whole scheme, which he thinks should be permanent.

This is exactly the point Senators BORAH and NYE have been making. The great love of the big-business man for the N.R.A. is proof to them that the small dealers are right in their contention that the former have been given the better of it. Mr. Grace meant well, but his endorsement was not felicitous. A few more like that; and so far as the N.R.A. is concerned, the Angel of Death will be on the wing.

SAFEGUARDING THE CONSUMERS' INTEREST—ADDRESS BY FREDERICK J. SCHLINK

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, on the 13th of January Frederick J. Schlink delivered an address over a national radio chain concerning the consumers' interests in certain N.R.A. codes. This address was originally presented on Saturday, January 6, before the American Academy of Political and Social Science in Philadelphia. The address, which was then scheduled to be broadcast over the Columbia chain, was ruled off the air a few minutes before the scheduled time, after Columbia Broadcasting Co. officials had seen a copy of the manuscript. Following objections to Washington by the consumers' group, an apology was made by the Columbia Broadcasting Co., which offered its broadcasting facilities for a later date, and the address was finally delivered on January 13. I ask unanimous consent that the address may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The recovery program has so far left to fend quite for itself one class, and that the most numerous class of all. Every one of us is a consumer; most of us are at the same time workers with hand or brain; though a considerable class, and that the most powerful, economically, manages to get along on income obtained without work, by taking toll through ownership of property, or through employment at a profit of the services of others. Each of us, nevertheless, even those on poor relief or in the penitentiary, is a consumer, and in that respect has an important and continuous stake in the operations of industry, the quality and quantity of its output, and, above all, in the prices charged per unit of quantity, durability, efficacy, or serviceability, for its goods and services.

This quality of being a consumer is so common and so inescapable that, like the air about us, we mostly take it for granted. A status so casually accepted is often one where negligence or indifference of the incumbent is most costly. Many of us who are studying the problems of the consumer think that his difficulties are in exactly that class—that while capital or ownership (and a small part of labor to a much smaller extent) are getting a certain share out of the working of the recovery program, those for whom industry and trade are supposed to operate are now and hereafter to get very little except an unrestricted opportunity to pay bills, bills for very large sums, indeed, which other groups have contracted, presumably in our behalf, but certainly without our understanding or approval.

These bills, paid and payable, take several forms, the first of which—and the one that first comes to everyone's mind when the costs of any new or changed social or economic program are considered—is taxes. This cost, though it will certainly be huge, will, in my opinion, be one of the lesser costs of the industrial-recovery program, so called, and the agricultural-adjustment program.

SMALL BUSINESS DEFENSELESS

The major costs will the the extra costs to the consumer, which the average consumer—a person of small income and limited economic opportunity—is in a very poor position to bear; and governmental and press and radio censorships being as they are, in a still worse position to comprehend and adapt himself to by adjustment of his expenditures or by organized protest or mass action of any kind. These costs are, to cut through a maze of intermediate steps and relationships, the costs to the customer of the extra profits and more secure profits that will accrue to business enterprisers under a new business system—a system which not only legitimatizes but encourages unrestrained monopoly profits, and punishes, as in the dry-cleaners' code, to name a single example of many, those dealers who are willing to serve customers at less than the standard monopoly price. The new system, moreover, makes no provision whatever, in practice or even in theory, for any basis of control or safeguarding of either price or quality in the interests of the general population of consumers; indeed, no definite economic or social philosophy is apparent in the movement as a whole; nor, apparently, are its leaders qualified by training or experience to develop one.

Mr. Roosevelt and his advisers have clearly taken over an astonishing amount of the principal ideas and points of view of the previous administrations: That the national prosperity and well-being are measured, first and foremost, by the profits of industry. If it happens that Mr. Brown, who lives with his too-large family in a city slum, pays more for everything he buys, from coffee to pancake flour, and cannot collect more as salary, wages, or tips, and as a result runs into personal and familial disaster, the new-deal experts and economists have neither advice nor help to offer. Their system has in it no elements of security or even of hope for Mr. Brown, either as a wageworker, as the operator of a small store or shop, or as a consumer. And at this point I assert that a new deal that has no certain and assured provisions in theory and in fact for the safeguarding of the small and weak enterpriser and the still smaller and weaker ultimate consumer is a new deal which must necessarily fail, not only to bring back the general prosperity, but even to bring back any lasting return of high profits and dividends to the owners and operators of industry and trade.

MASSES ARE WORSE OFF

The simple doctrines of the new-deal philosophers have their weakness, and their similarity at bottom to the ideas of the Coolidge-Hoover epoch, in their special adaptation to the purposes and needs of the very income classes who are most able to take care of themselves, either in good or in poor times; who can expand their spendings for subsistence and comforts and security for themselves and their families by a sizable proportion and still have a safe margin left. The new-deal ideas are the ideas of men of substance and large, or at the very least, ample income. Nowhere in the councils of the administration is there a place, or even a hearing, for the men and women who cannot spend an extra 10 cents for this, an extra 20 for that, whose income is now and will remain smaller rather than larger, and whose needs are at least as great as before.

I recognize that there is nothing sacred or unchangeable about an economic system, especially about one so imperfect and inequitable as the one which is breaking up about us, but I submit that an uprooting of traditional safeguards, and a great worsening of the purchasing power of the masses, should not be a change that takes most from those at the bottom of the economic heap and gives more to those at the top. Reemployment of workers achieved at the cost of reduced purchasing power of those 60 million persons or so, including the reemployed workers, already depressed to or below the level of safe or decent living, is a mode of reconstruction that will neither last long nor bring real or substantial benefits to large numbers while it does last.

REDISTRIBUTE BY TAXATION

The only way to redistribute income in our present highly complex society—and beyond all question such redistribution is inevitable if we are to continue any sort of capitalistic economic order—is bluntly and forthrightly to redistribute it, and to do so by bold and drastic measures of taxation in proportion to the ability to pay (which obviously excludes any form of sales or processing taxes); and by abandonment of all those tenets of laissez faire whose support by the Government has been in effect a subsidy to the rich and powerful and a heavy tax upon the poor, the ignorant, and the helpless.

The Government, while adhering to the principle of a minimum degree of interference in business management, and maintaining maximum freedom of decision for ownership and management, has sharply and decisively, and in my view catastrophically, interfered in the consumer's freedom to purchase goods and to hire services of laundry and hotel and even of banking in an open, competitive market, and to put one seller against another in a rivalry of price and quality in which the best at a stated price, or the cheapest at a stated quality, wins the customer. And to the heavy costs of a protective tariff, which puts a tremendous burden of expenditure upon consumers, is added the further huge cost of monopoly prices of thousands of commodities and services in a noncompetitive market under the eye and by the deliberate choice of a Government always watchful to aid business and always blind and deaf to the needs and rights of ultimate consumers.

C.A.B. NOT CONSUMER VEHICLE

The slight, formal protection to consumers' interests nominally afforded within the National Recovery and Agricultural Adjustment Administrations is at best a defense so weak as hardly to warrant serious consideration at this time. The business press, indeed, far from finding these protections significant or formidable, sees them as laughable, deserving of cynical and sarcastic comment. Economic literature with its customary deliberateness has not yet got around to considering them critically at all. An agency which, as in the case of the Consumers' Advisory Board of N.R.A., is at most advisory, and only weakly and hesitatingly so at best, and is not in any of its functions able to act frankly, openly, and responsibly as an advocate and defender of consumers' interests on all matters of moment; which is without technically informed or qualified leadership or direction; which has not even access to the press or publicity and has no bulletin service of its own; which has no theory of reasonable price or even of price control; which by its tolerance and inaction encourages rather than restrains or thwarts price and policy groupings by thousands of national and regional trade associations and similar agencies; which accepts limitation of production at a time when production, of manufactured goods at least, is far below rather than above the reasonable requirements of the population; whose economic advisers are so wise or blase economically as to believe neither in free competition nor in regulated monopoly—nor in anything else—as a brake upon sellers' greed or overreaching; and which neither employs nor commands technical services of any sort expert in consumers' goods, in its exchanges with enormously powerful and well-staffed industry and labor groups that are represented in the recovery program—such a body can lay no proper claim to being official counsel for or defender of consumers' rights and interests, nor has it the least right to complain, as it has complained, of lack of support or interest of consumers and consumers' organizations in its views or attitudes or appeals.

CODES FRAMED IN SECRET

The whole system of setting up of codes of self-government in industry in whose operation not even the Government itself, much less consumers and labor, has a dominating voice or one that is clearly heard or even mentioned in the public prints, is a situation so patently opposed to the public right and interest that it is but necessary to mention it to indicate its absurdity and the abdication which it represents of the proper function of government as regulator, arbiter, and controller. To talk of the influence of a consumers' advisory board in such circumstances is like speaking of the power of the Chicago Sunday-school superintendents' association or Chicago University's department of philosophy in the conduct of "Big Bill" Thompson's positive, aggressive, well-heeled, and very predatory city government. The governmental forces supposed to be acting for the consumer in the recovery program never so much as come into actual engagement with the forces of big business. The men of industry and the businesslike, business-trained, and business-advised recovery administrators, who work out their code provisions in the secret and efficient preliminary conferences where consumers are neither represented nor considered, and who of their own motion have removed from codes consumer-protective provisions (which in some cases industry's representatives themselves were progressive or intelligent enough to insert for the general good of their customers and their trade), see to that and see to it effectively with a finish and a sureness of touch and a knowledge of the wants of their clientele that would be admirable if the efforts were in the least degree socially motivated or were even capable of being deflected somewhat for the social good.

The consumers' boards do not have any clientele of consumers. They advise the recovery administrator or the Secretary of Agriculture only if and when and to the extent that he chooses to be advised. If they advise him too much or press him with arguments that tend to become annoying or to warn or alarm any part of the great body of consumers, he quickly and firmly puts them back in their appointed place, as window dressing for an operation whose actualities are very different and very much more sinister than anything the public is allowed to suspect. Both consumers' advisory boards are in the anomalous and highly dubious position of the attorney who is assured that while he is, of course, working for Mr. H he is to take all his orders from and make all his reports to Mr. J and Mr. J alone.

N.R.A. AND A.A.A. ANTICONSUMER

The recovery program is not set up even to give consumers a knowledge of what is going on, much less an opportunity to exercise substantial influence upon the direction and quantitative impact of the conclusions reached by big business and its very able and aggressive and forceful ambassadors to Washington—delegates who are not represented in the N.R.A., but constitute it, and so, in every practical sense, become the government rather than serve or advise it. I say, therefore, deliberately and with knowledge of the movement of forces and actions and trends in N.R.A. and A.A.A., that as an agency providing for protection of the general and public as against the special and business interest, neither N.R.A. or A.A.A. merits even consideration. N.R.A. particularly, and A.A.A. to a less degree, is definitely anticonsumer in purpose, and policy, and especially in business-derived personnel selected to wield the enormous powers of the administration. To suggest improvements in the situation would be simply to propose rejection of the entire present mechanism, and above all to call for the immediate reversal and illegalizing of all agreements, effective or proposed, which permit industrialists or merchants collusively and concertedly to control production, prices, and marketing policies without respect for and without full, potent, and in every sense equal representation of those who buy, and must buy, the goods and services produced and merchandised by factories, farms, service agencies, and mercantile establishments. The major functions that government should have in this or any other recovery program are functions that are not being performed or even adumbrated by the present policies and machinery. There are certain fundamentals which the consumer, that is, the eating and wearing and using and buying citizenry at large, has a right to receive from industry; if and as industry fails to grant these rights and safeguards, the Government itself must provide them, completely, as that minimum and indispensable protection which, even in the neat and well-ordered political economy of Adam Smith, Government owed to every person under its sovereignty.

CONSUMER MUST KNOW TRUTH

The first right of the consumer is to know the truth about that which he buys—not the seller's idea of the truth, but the knowledge which is essential to efficient and economical selection and use by the buyer and user of a product or service. Not only the bare or grudging truth but truth freely and frankly interpreted so that it can be effectively used in a purchase at an economical price from a mail-order house or the corner store. The whole truth and the relevant truth about merchandise would at once demolish the area of immensely profitable industry now dependent for its success upon the right of the seller to lie and to cheat almost at will, without interference by the State or any other potent agency. Off would go the business of nearly all the patent medicines, the costly but useless mouthwashes and antiseptics, the diabetes and influenza cures, the headache remedies, the baldness cures, and the "nourishing" and "youthifying" cosmetics without number. Half or more of the radio sets and nearly all the phonographs and electric appliances would disappear and be replaced by first-class equipment. If the technical truth were told about them, all our telephone instruments would have to be radically redesigned. The tremendous waste that is now the silk trade—with its thin and flimsy web of cloth heavily adulterated with lead and tin, and so enormously decreased in life and wearing qualities, and, in the case of lead weighting, turned into a new and insidious hazard to the wearer—would be extensively reformed, or would give place to something else and something honest. The sellers of apples and pears, cauliflower and cabbage, and broccoli that are free from worms but are heavily dosed with the deadly metals, arsenic and lead, now used in enormous quantities and poisonous alike to insects and to human beings, would suddenly find their business deflated and their customers fleeing to other foods, if it became necessary to tell not only that the apples and pears were free of worms but were decidedly not free of the poison sprays.

STANDARDS FOR CONSUMER

The next major area in which industry and government owe the consumer a new and fair deal is that of standards of grade and quality. Industry itself uses quality standards freely in its own purchasing; its most ably administered plants will defend to the death their right to buy soap and paper and typewriter ribbons on a basis which assures a grade and quality, neither too high nor too low, precisely adapted to their needs, at a price level their purposes and finances permit or incline them to pay. At the present time all the various standards-making agencies of the country are devoid of effective consumer representation; they are all heavily biased for trade and industry and agriculture.

They are making standards in the main for the benefit of the seller and not of the buyer, a situation which curiously enough prevails even in much of the Government's specification work for its own needs as a consumer. Like the Bureau of Standards and the Bureau of Agricultural Economics, the various standards-making bodies are setting up standards whose very names (like that of the Bureau of Standards for "bronze" screen wire, which isn't bronze at all but a far cheaper alloy of copper), mislead the buyer and favor the seller. There is the standard for ripe olives whose sizes begin with "standard" (which are not standard at all, but the smallest size marketed) and end with "colossal"; and the mirrors (Bureau of Standards again) whose three upper grades are by an ingenious and happy selection of nomenclature grade 1, grade A, and grade AA; it is no accident, of course, that each of these three grades can be represented and sold as first to top grade. Surely grade 1 is grade 1 to the consumer.

PROFESSOR LYND'S PROPOSAL

A mild and reasonable proposal of Professor Lynd, of the Consumers' Advisory Board of N.R.A., to set up new and effective machinery that would enable consumers to buy on a basis similar to that enjoyed by the Bell Telephone system and the Detroit Edison Co. was met with loud cries of rage by advertising men who saw in this modest proposal the nearer approach of that awful specter of communism. What the objector really meant, and rightly, was that the general purchase and sale of goods and services upon clear and honest specifications, similar to the best of those used by Government and big industry for their own purposes (not, of course, those devised and sponsored by the Government services for the use of sellers in bilking consumers) spells the doom of a major part of competitive advertising and salesmanship, and the wiping out of a great deal of very profitable economic waste and concealed subsidies to press and radio.

Clearly, if the Government grade A symbol is generally applied to cans of peas and corn, and the grading competently and honestly done, then the product of any crossroads canner, too poor or too honest to advertise competitively, takes its place squarely and fairly and at a lower price, besides that of the huge cannery monopolies that blanket the popular magazines and the billboards with their pretty and misleading and very expensive pictures and claims. Wide use by consumers of Government-sponsored standards and specifications on however elementary or primitive a basis would be disastrous to advertisers and to publishers and radio-station owners who live upon advertising claims for standards, would make actual quality an effective and inexpensive substitute for audacious and resounding claims built upon a basis of ingenious sophistries and imagery and the thesaurus and almost completely hollow with respect to such facts as would be determined by impartial comparison and tests conducted by relatively illiterate fellows who can read a micrometer or a voltmeter but have trouble with adjectives and adverbs.

STANDARDS FOR BUYERS

But standards and specifications, to be fair and effective from the buyer's standpoint, require that he shall be represented by qualified experts in the process of testing and specification writing from the beginning and at every important part of the process. The Government standardization work does not now provide and has not in the past provided any such representation of consumers, nor does the Government—Federal or State—even prevent or discourage grossly misleading advertising, so long as such advertising defrauds only the consumer. The Government does sometimes concern itself with misleading claims which result in unfair competition between competing manufacturers or dealers. Government has habitually taken more seriously its duty to act as referee between competing, differentially dishonest enterprises than between the powerful, well-organized seller and the weak and isolated buyer. The Supreme Court itself has so interpreted the law underlying the work of the Federal Trade Commission, which on a few occasions so far exceeded its powers as to interfere with manufacturers who cheated and misadvised and imperiled (as did the maker of a leading obesity cure) not each other but the consumers of their product.

Until recent years we have taken it for granted that the price of goods was determined and should be determined by the competition of seller against seller and buyer against buyer in the market place. In this way it was supposed that a pervasive, resistless, and automatic adjustment of price to proper and just amounts took place. Modern economic thought has slowly come to recognize that such adjustment was more an ideal than an actuality; that lags, leaks, and frictions worked in such ways, and so pervasively as to disadvantage the small seller as against the large and the individual buyer as against the organized seller; that, for example, the service of advertising, now a tremendous factor in marketing, is primarily to enable a product to escape the rigors of competitive pricing, and that many other means to elimination of price competition exist and are regularly used by powerful selling interests (and in the case of the raw-material markets, such as tobacco and cattle and swine, by the organized and incorporated buyers equipped with every market controlling and manipulating device, dealing with weak and unorganized producing or farmer sellers, possessed of neither information nor bargaining skill or organization).

N.R.A. A BOON TO TRUSTS

Anyway, competition is out as a regulator and is daily more and more noticeably impotent in this and every other country, though Congressmen and other political leaders still like to talk about the changeless law of supply and demand and will no doubt continue to do so 25 years after its last vestiges have been nullified by the advance of national and regional trusts under N.R.A., and by continued extension of the general and pervasive doctrines of a chamber of commerce civilization bent on pleasing business and squeezing consumers. For the past several years, even while the antitrust acts remained in nominal force, the Government has seen no virtue in continuing the rule of competition which once provided certain safeguards against excessive prices to consumers (though it never did, of course, assure a living or a comfort wage to workers). Yet the Government's executives, even those who have been served by advisers trained in economics, with singular blindness or obtuseness have seen no need to supply some other safeguard adapted or adequate to prevent extortionate prices. The consumer, it seems, is somehow to pay whatever charges business men choose—in joint councils, blessed and in no way restrained by the recovery administrations—to levy upon their customers.

No one seems to know or care what will happen if price increases total, as they assuredly will, sums greater than consumers' pocketbooks can stand, or even what will happen to industry itself, if a further ten or twenty million people are forced back to the coolie level of consumption, a not unlikely consequence of present governmental and business price policies. It seems yet too soon for our leaders to understand that the whole success of the recovery program depends upon an increase rather than a decrease of consumers' demand in terms of physical volume of goods and increased purchasing power equivalent at least to the added cost of the new wage payments and governmental subsidies and manufacturers' profits that are to take place.

Economists and engineers know that such an increase of physical volume of consumption of goods is neither in prospect nor under a monopoly price system possible. It is not even part of the thinking of the new-deal executives. How shall Mr. Brown's purchasing as a consumer rehabilitate industry if industry's goods cost more and the extra cost is, without governmental restraint or intervention, devoted to an increase of profits and investment, and not to an increase in Mr. Brown's wage at least equivalent to the extra prices charged? Would it not be more fair and a great deal wiser for the Government first to guarantee Mr. Brown his old spending power in terms of food, clothing, and other necessities (and, in any case, as a minimum, the Department of Labor's subsistence level), and then to Mr. Brown, as a worker, his old job or some socially useful job as nearly as possible like it; and then, if there remain a surplus with which to do it, to Mr. Brown's employer a profit for himself?

WHY NOT A CONSUMERS' SUBSIDY?

This order of relief could not possibly please the employers, as the recovery administrators know too well; but as things go now employers are not going to be pleased long or profited long, anyway; they cannot run their business without customers, and the Government will end the present impasse either by furnishing a subsidy to industry to enable it to continue its necessary services on a socialized basis, without cash-paying customers, or will give subsidies to the customers themselves, as it does now to farmer-consumers under the agricultural recovery plan. The consumers' subsidy looks like the wiser plan. When some middleman receives the grant in aid, the money seems to trickle off to the wrong places, as it does when the shipping companies are subsidized by the Government and the lawyers and lobbyists and ex-Government officials and an ex-Presidential Secretary collect extensively, or as when the packers took their millions of dollars of toll on the processing of the hogs recently slaughtered as a quick subsidy meant for the midwestern farmer.

A rational basis of pricing seems to have been given no consistent thought by the recovery administration. The businessmen's codes, written by themselves and pretty generally approved by Government, provide cost of production (and that of the less efficient producers) plus profit, to business, or conceal provisions shrewdly devised for this purpose somewhere among the more technical clauses, but the farmer is not granted cost of production of his crop because that, as the argument runs, would be un-American, socialistic, and counter to the unchangeable law of supply and demand. It is even more important and logical, of course, that the consumer, that is, each of us, is entitled to cost of living, in terms of money or goods. I confess myself unable to understand why the recovery administrator is prepared to guarantee the prosperous merchant on Fifth Avenue or Market Street the full cost of his merchandise, plus an additional charge to cover labor and overhead, and to penalize him by a heavy fine if he fails to collect this much on each and every sale, but sees no duty whatever to the customer to assure his having the money to make the purchase or to the farmer who grows the cotton, wool, or foodstuffs sold by the merchant, to assure him sufficient money to support his family and pay his hired man to the scale of a decent standard of living.

BIG BUSINESS IN COMMAND

These questions all find their answer, if we allow for the fact that the Government sees itself, now as hitherto, primarily as the protector and friend of business; that all the hopeful and often generous words of the President and his collaborators must be judged against the real intention of the administration, as determined by the powerful and continuous impact of its advisers and executors; these as all will have noted, are almost without exception industrialists of the big-business viewpoint, with a thin sprinkling of economists who see economic society against an unbroken background of industry, trade, and finance, and not at all as growing, reaping, grinding, fabricating, transporting, and consuming.

It will be a long time before a municipal, State, or National Government which does not refrain from cheats, suppressions, falsifications of statistics, and evasions of reality in the conduct of its own affairs will be able to control business and industry mainly and faithfully in the interests of the consuming population. Government bureaus which for years have employed the tricks and dodges of press agents and advertising experts, and have conducted public business in a very unpublic fashion, suppressing information of vital public importance, and distorting other important information in an arrant and shameless manner, as have the Food and Drug Administration, the Bureau of Public Health, the Bureau of Mines, and the Bureau of Labor Statistics, to name but four offending with especial hardihood in recent years, will need time and a long period of reorientation and training in the public interest, with a great deal of help and frank criticism from the outside, before they can furnish a high ethical and economic leadership to the men of the shop and the counting house, the patent medicine and the liquor trade, and the motion-picture baronage.

A DEPARTMENT OF THE CONSUMER

To hasten the day of governmental concern for consumer's rights and interests, consumer's research is pressing for the organization of a department of the consumer in the Federal Government, with its secretary a member of the President's Cabinet. Its duties would be to encourage and advance research in the sciences, economics, and technologies related to consumers' goods and services, to coordinate all governmental activities affecting consumers' interests, to deflect and to guide them ever in the direction of advantage of consumers at large, and to keep a watchful eye and issue ceaseless publicity on other governmental departments, such as the Tariff Commission, Food and Drug, and Public Health Administrations, and other agencies whose operations closely affect or in any way directly or remotely threaten or invade consumers' protection and interests.

While admitting the inherent weakness of any such agency operating under the very aegis of the Government which it would be its duty to criticize and to orient, we see little hope for establishing a consumer-conscious governmental and industrial system in America unless and until a beginning is made to set up specific, publicly recognized services within the Government itself; to establish a rational basis of concern and control for costs and prices of consumers' goods; to provide a service of information, precise and truthful description and interpretation of goods, their quality and kind, in their consumption relationships; and to guide and to set up standards and specifications which shall establish minimums of quality and grade below which products may not fall and be allowed to reach the consumers' market, and several other and higher levels of grades as circumstances may require, defined by and for consumers with expert professional advice and service from Government agencies.

Perhaps the most important service of such a department would be in the popularization it would provide of the basic ideas of consumption economics and the consumption technologies, its stimulation of scientific and economic research in these now unpopular and lowly fields of thought, and its focusing of public attention upon the idea that the purpose of industry and trade must be made primarily to serve their customers, and only secondarily or at long last, to provide security or wealth to owners of and traders in securities, to writers of advertising and to practitioners of other parasitic trades and callings.

It must be remembered that in spite of all the defining and redefining of the consumer, searching him out in his various forms by the consumers boards, and their Aristotelian philosophizing about his economic place and function, one certainly stands out; that our modern system of industry, geared up for large-volume mass production is utterly dependent for its functioning on continuous large-volume consumption matching the volume of production. The consumer, if and when he is conscious of his power, has one invincible weapon at his command. He can refuse to buy beyond his bare necessities. Indeed, increasing millions of consumers are offered no choice in this respect. When he takes this position either from purpose or necessity, no amount or quality of economic reasoning can save what remains of our business system. The consumer had better be served; in the ultimate emergency which seems to be fast approaching, he must and will be served, or his refusal or failure to buy will bring the present business and financial structure tumbling about him.

REFINANCING OF FARM DEBTS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2225) to provide for the establishment of a corporation to aid in the refinancing of farm debts, and for other purposes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, the pending measure, Senate bill 2225, the unfinished business, was identical with a bill introduced in the body at the other end of the Capitol, House bill 6670, to provide for the establishment of a corporation to aid in the refinancing of farm debts, and for other purposes.

The Senate bill was considered by the Committee on Banking and Currency, and a favorable report was made thereon, certain amendments being recommended. The House bill was considered by the body at the other end of the Capitol and passed a few days ago; and upon being transmitted to the Senate that bill was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, which committee has reported the House bill with substantially the same amendments as were proposed by the committee to the Senate bill.

I ask unanimous consent that the House bill be now substituted for the Senate bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H.R. 6670) to provide for the establishment of a corporation to aid in the refinancing of farm debts, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Banking and Currency with amendments.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, as already stated, a number of amendments have been proposed to this bill by the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency, the same amendments being offered to the Senate bill as those relating to the House bill. I will take just a few minutes to analyze the amendments.

The amendment on page 1 establishes by law the new corporation which the bill contemplates rather than, as is provided in the House bill and the original Senate measure, to authorize the Governor of the Farm Credit Administration to charter the corporation.

The first amendment on page 2 reduces the membership of the board as originally proposed from five to three, the reductions being made by eliminating the two members which it was proposed should be appointed outside the Government service by the Governor; and the board of directors, as it will be composed if the amendment shall be agreed to, will consist of the Secretary of the Treasury or an officer of the Treasury designated by him, the Governor of the Farm Credit Administration, and the Land Bank Commissioner.

The next amendment on page 2 deprives the Governor of the Farm Credit Administration of the power to amend the charter of the Farm Mortgage Corporation and authorizes the adoption of rules and regulations for the enforcement of the act.

On page 3 there is an amendment authorizing the requirement of bonds in the cases of those employees of the corporation who are regarded as of sufficient responsibility to justify requiring bonds.

The second amendment on page 3 merely carries into effect the provisions of existing law that no salary shall be paid to any employee in excess of $10,000 and limits to $6,000 the salary that may be paid to any person or employee appointed as an agent or officer or employee of the Corporation, except with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. CLARK. I should like to inquire whether it is the Senator's opinion that this provision would apply to the general agents provided for under the existing Agricultural Credit Administration, to the presidents of cooperatives, the intermediate credit, and the other agencies set up under the present act.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Without further examination of the matter, I do not think that the limitation proposed in the committee amendment to this bill would apply to any other act than the pending measure. It will, as already stated, limit salaries, and require confirmation in the cases referred to, respecting certain employees under the terms of this bill.

The amendment on page 4, near the top of the page, is restrictive of the powers of the directors.

The amendment at the top of page 5 does not make any substantial change in the effect of the legislation; and the same thing is true of the amendment at the bottom of page 6, and also of that at the top of page 7. They are principally clarifying amendments.

On page 7, at subparagraph (b), there is an amendment as follows:

> And to invest its funds in mortgage loans made under section 32 of the Emergency Farm Mortgage Act of 1933, as amended.

This amendment is not a change in the spirit of the bill, but it is offered in order to make certain that the power to make the investments mentioned shall exist.

The amendments on page 8 are merely clarifying amendments.

On page 9, in section 9, which proposes to continue the power of the Farm Mortgage Corporation in lieu of the Land Bank Commissioner to make the class of loans contemplated by the bill, there is an amendment limiting to February 1, 1936, the time within which the class of loans referred to may be made.

The remaining amendment proposed by the committee, found on page 14, does not, as I understand it, substantially change the purpose or effect of the measure, but it incorporates language which has been worked out by the Governor of the Federal Reserve Board.

Of course, it is well understood that the Federal land banks have already nearly exhausted the cash capital available for the making of these loans, in commitments by way of approved loans. Not only is that true, but there have been approvals to the amount of several hundred million dollars in excess of the amount of funds available for the purpose of the act. It has therefore been found necessary, in order that the bonds authorized under the act may find a market, to guarantee both the principal and the interest, the interest only being guaranteed on certain bonds authorized under previous legislation.

Unless this measure be promptly enacted, there will come a suspension in the making of the loans, which, it is believed, would be very detrimental to the agricultural interests of the country.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield.

Mr. FESS. Does the guaranty extend further than the debentures covered in the bill?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The guaranty is limited to the debentures authorized in the bill.

Mr. FESS. It likely will extend later, will it not, to the farm land bank bonds also?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. No; this legislation does not contemplate a Federal guaranty of Federal land bank bonds.

Mr. FESS. It is limited to just these debentures?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. This is limited to the bonds issued under the terms of the bill.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. NYE. I thought the Senator from Ohio had propounded the question I had in mind, but evidently he has not. I should like to know whether there is contemplated any program which will extend the privileges provided under this bill to farm land-bank bonds in general?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I do not understand that such is the case. I have no information that such legislation is contemplated.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I understand this measure does not cover home-loan bonds.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. It does not.

Mr. BORAH. Does not the Senator think it will be necessary to deal with that subject?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I do; and it is my understanding that as speedily as the matter may be dealt with legislation will be presented giving to the securities issued by the Home Owners' Loan Corporation a status similar to that provided for the bonds authorized under this measure, and that is necessary, from my standpoint, at least, for almost identical reasons.

The debentures now being issued by the Home Owners' Loan Corporation carry the same guaranty as to interest as do the bonds issued under the emergency Farm Mortgage Corporation Act, but they do not carry any guaranty as to principal, and it has been found difficult, quite naturally, to obtain funds with which to make the loans under the Home Loan Owners' Act after they have been approved. The process of making the loans is being slowed down. Unless the pending measure is enacted, as I have already intimated or declared, there will come a suspension in the making of farm loans which will be very detrimental to agriculture, at least to farm owners, and I think the same is true with respect to loans on homes.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, the Senator's answer to the question of the Senator from North Dakota was not as emphatic as I thought the Senator ought to make it. I hope the Senator can make it more emphatic than he did, and assure us that there is nothing here which would guarantee the principal of bonds already issued.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I said that that was the case, and that there is no intention, so far as I am advised, certainly there is nothing in this measure, to guarantee outstanding bonds of the Federal land banks. I must decline to make a violent declaration on the subject. A simple statement of the fact, it seems to me, is adequate for the requirements of this discussion. If I did not make myself clear, I hope I can do so by repeating what I recall to have been the statement already made. This measure does not contemplate the guaranty of Federal land-bank bonds generally.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. May I ask the Senator another question?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Is it the Senator's belief that if this bill be passed and enacted, and the bonds referred to are guaranteed by the Government of the United States, that there will be a disposition to lend money at a lower rate of interest?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The pending bill does not contemplate any change in the rate of interest, and I do not know whether a lower rate will be made available for borrowers than that which is provided under the existing law. The primary purpose of this measure is to obtain the funds necessary to carry on activities which have already been authorized, to supply the resources with which to make the loans as they are approved under existing law. Of course, there are other changes in the measure to which reference has been made, but that is the fundamental purpose.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. If I may ask the Senator another question, does not the Senator think it is reasonable to expect that, these bonds being guaranteed by the Government of the United States, they will be more easily sold than bonds which are not guaranteed?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. If they are not more easily sold than the bonds now authorized, the whole refinancing program will be in danger of collapsing. I certainly think that is true. That is the object of the provision—to make sure that the funds will be obtainable. Let me add that this measure is believed to be very essential.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me again?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. FESS. The Senator will recall that near the close of the last administration there was enacted the Federal Home Loan Bank Act, under which we established a central system similar to the Federal Reserve System to deal with the mortgages held by loan associations. In the discussion of that legislation much was said about the guaranty of bonds, whether they were Government bonds or not, and the Senator will recall that an amendment was adopted in the Senate providing that there should be written on the face of the bond contemplated by that measure a statement that it was not a Government bond.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. FESS. I have wondered whether this legislation will not ultimately lead to the guaranty of both the bonds covered by the pending measure and the farm land-bank bonds. It seems to me that it will.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, of course, one can hardly enter the realm of prophecy with a sense of certainty. I do not think that such will be the result of this legislation, and I do not believe that the Government can guarantee all bonds which may be issued by the Federal land banks. I do not believe it ought to be expected to do that. Of course, during these times there come very rapid changes in conditions. What a future Congress will do God alone knows.

The fact is that it was believed, when these bonds were authorized, that a guaranty of the interest would be sufficient to assure their sale under conditions which would enable the Farm Credit Administration to make the loans called for, but experience has shown that that is not the case, and I do not feel that the guaranty of these bonds imposes any very substantial liability on the Government. Under the circumstances, it, of course, augments the liability of the Government, in theory at least; but the loans are being made on a basis which it is expected the borrowers will be able to meet. I do not think the liability under this measure, or probably under arrangements respecting home-loan bonds, will be very great, so far as the Government is concerned.

Mr. FESS. I have the same feeling, but the question is, Would not the same argument apply to the farm land-bank bonds?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I do not think so. The farm land banks are engaged in the general business of making loans. It would involve a new departure to commit the Government to the guaranty of all bonds issued by the land banks. That is a question, of course, on which the Senator's judgment may be as good as that of the Senator who now occupies the floor, or even better.

Mr. FESS. I may say to the Senator from Arkansas that I have never been in favor of guaranteeing those bonds. On the other hand, I have continually contested the idea that the Government has any responsibility in meeting them; but I was thinking that this sort of legislation might lead to what the Senator and I have not favored in the past. That was the only question I had in mind.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Of course, it is possible that some may propose to guarantee other bonds. I realize that often precedents are expanded by future actions; but this precedent does not, in my judgment, justify any such anticipation.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I should like to inquire whether the bill under consideration is retroactive in respect of financing bonds already issued and which carry a guaranty of interest only, or whether it relates solely to future financing.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I will ask the Senator to repeat his question. I could not hear it.

Mr. AUSTIN. I wish to learn whether the proposed bill provides for refinancing bonds already issued and which are now guaranteed only as to interest.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. There is a provision in the bill, on page 7, subsection (b), as follows—I read it as it is proposed the provision should be amended:

(b) The corporation is further authorized to purchase from time to time, for cash, such consolidated farm-loan bonds at such prices and upon such terms as may be approved by the board of directors of the corporation, to make loans to Federal land banks on the security of such consolidated bonds, and to invest its funds in mortgage loans made under section 32 of the Emergency Farm Mortgage Act of 1933, as amended.

That provision would authorize the absorption of what I believe amounts to about $150,000,000 in consolidated bonds authorized heretofore to be issued.

Mr. AUSTIN. I thank the Senator.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I ask for action on the amendments.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will state the first amendment.

The first amendment of the Committee on Banking and Currency was, on page 1, line 3, after the word "That", to strike out "the Governor of the Farm Credit Administration, hereinafter in this act referred to as the 'Governor', is authorized to organize and charter" and insert "there is hereby established"; on the same page, line 8, after the word "The", to insert "principal office of the corporation shall be located in the District of Columbia, and the management of the corporation shall be vested in a"; on page 2, line 2, after the word "directors", to strike out "of such corporation shall consist" and insert "consisting"; on the same page, line 4, after the word "Governor", to strike out the comma and "the" and insert "of the Farm Credit Administration hereinafter in this act referred to as the 'Governor', and the "; in line 6, after the word "Commissioner", to strike out the comma and "and two officers of the Farm Credit Administration to be designated by the Governor. The terms of the directors designated by the Governor shall be for a period of 12 months commencing January 1 of each year, but the terms of the directors first designated shall be for the balance of the 12 months' period commencing January 1, 1934, but a director appointed to fill a vacancy shall hold his office for the unexpired term of the director whose place he is selected to fill. Any director designated by the Governor may at any time be removed by him for cause."; in line 22, after the word "bylaws" and the comma, to insert "rules, regulations,"; in line 23, after the word "amendments", to strike out "to the charter of the corporation" and insert "thereto"; in line 25, after the word "corporation", to insert "authorized under this act"; on page 3, line 4, after the word "compensation", to insert "and duties"; in line 7, after the word "corporation", to insert "by this act, to require bonds of them and fix the penalties thereof and dismiss them at pleasure"; and in line 10, after the word "paid", to strike out "but the rates of compensation for the performance of the duties of the respective offices and positions under the corporation shall not exceed the rates prescribed for comparable duties by the salary schedules of the Classification Act of 1923, as amended" and to insert "but the rate of compensation of such agents, officers, and employees of the corporation shall be subject to the limitation contained in section 66 of the Farm Credit Act of 1933: Provided, That no person shall be appointed as an agent, officer, or employee of the corporation under this act at a salary of $6,000 or more per annum except with the advice and consent of the Senate", so as to make the section read:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby established a corporation to be known as the "Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation", hereinafter in this act referred to as the "corporation." The principal office of the corporation shall be located in the District of Columbia and the management of the corporation shall be vested in a board of directors consisting of the Secretary of the Treasury, or an officer of the Treasury designated by him, the Governor of the Farm Credit Administration, hereinafter in this act referred to as the "Governor", and the Land Bank Commissioner. The directors shall receive no additional compensation for their services as directors of the corporation, but may be allowed actual necessary traveling and subsistence expenses when engaged in the business of the corporation outside of the District of Columbia. The Governor shall be the chairman of the board of directors. The directors shall have power to adopt such bylaws, rules, regulations, and amendments thereto as they deem necessary for the conduct of the business of the corporation authorized under this act. The directors shall have power, without regard to the provisions of other laws applicable to the employment and compensation of officers and employees of the United States, to employ and fix the compensation and duties of such agents, officers, and employees of the corporation as may be necessary to carry out the powers and duties conferred upon the corporation by this act, to require bonds of them and fix the penalties thereof and dismiss them at pleasure, and to prescribe the manner in which the obligations of the corporation shall be incurred and its expenses allowed and paid, but the rate of compensation of such agents, officers, and employees of the corporation shall be subject to the limitation contained in section 66 of the Farm Credit Act of 1933: Provided, That no person shall be appointed as an agent, officer, or employee of the corporation under this act at a salary of $6,000 or more per annum except with the advice and consent of the Senate.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, line 2, after the word "power", to insert "as may be", and in line 4, after the word "this", to strike out "or any other act of Congress as may be provided by law or in its charter and bylaws or in any amendments thereto" and insert "act", so as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. The corporation shall have succession until dissolved by act of Congress; shall have power to sue and be sued in any court, to adopt and use a corporate seal, to make contracts, and to acquire, hold, and dispose of real and personal property necessary and incident to the conduct of its business; and shall have such other powers as may be necessary and incident to carrying out its powers and duties under this act. The corporation shall be entitled to the free use of the United States mails in the same manner as the executive departments of the Government. The corporation, with the consent of any board, commission, independent establishment, or executive department of the Government, may avail itself of the use of information, services, facilities, officers, agents, and employees thereof, in carrying out the provisions of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, line 23, after the word "transferred", to strike out "and made available to the Governor" and insert "to the corporation", so as to make the section read:

SEC. 3. The capital of the corporation shall be in the sum of $200,000,000, which shall be subscribed by the Governor on behalf of the United States in such amounts and at such times as he deems necessary for the purposes of the corporation. For the purpose of such capital subscription, the funds and proceeds thereof made available to the Land Bank Commissioner under section 32 of the Emergency Farm Mortgage Act of 1933 and the mortgages taken by the Commissioner and the credit instruments secured thereby are hereby transferred to the corporation.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 5, line 2, after the word "issue", to insert "and have outstanding at any one time"; in line 3, before the word "amount", to insert "aggregate"; in line 4, after the word "exceeding", to strike out "in the aggregate"; in the same line, after the figures "$2,000,000,000", to strike out "at any one time outstanding"; in line 12, after the word "United", to strike out "States," and the comma and insert "States"; in line 13, after the word "and", to insert "such bonds"; in line 14, after the word "shall", to strike out the comma and "on account of such guaranty,"; on page 6, line 22, after the word "of", to strike out the article "a" and insert "any"; in the same line, after the word "bank", to strike out "issuing bonds after the enactment of this act under the provisions of the Federal Farm Loan Act, as amended,"; in line 25, after the word "face", to strike out "value" and the semicolon and insert "value issued under the Federal Farm Loan Act, as amended,"; and on page 7, line 1, after the word "exchange", to insert "such", so as to read:

SEC. 4. (a) With the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, the corporation is authorized to issue and have outstanding at any one time bonds in an aggregate amount not exceeding $2,000,000,000. Such bonds shall be in such forms and denominations, shall have such maturities, shall bear such rates of interest, shall be subject to such terms and conditions, and shall be issued in such manner and sold at such prices, as may be prescribed by the corporation, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury. Such bonds shall be fully and unconditionally guaranteed both as to interest and principal by the United States and such guaranty shall be expressed on the face thereof, and such bonds shall be lawful investments, and may be accepted as security for all fiduciary, trust, and public funds the investment or deposit of which shall be under the authority or control of the United States or any officer or officers thereof. In the event that the corporation shall be unable to pay upon demand, when due, the principal of, or interest on, such bonds, the Secretary of the Treasury shall pay to the holder the amount thereof which is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and thereupon to the extent of the amount so paid the Secretary of the Treasury shall succeed to all the rights of the holders of such bonds. The Secretary of the Treasury, in his discretion, is authorized to purchase any bonds of the corporation issued hereunder, and for such purpose the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to use as a public-debt transaction the proceeds from the sale of any securities hereafter issued under the Second Liberty Loan Act, as amended, and the purposes for which securities may be issued under such act, as amended, are extended to include any purchases of the corporation's bonds hereunder. The Secretary of the Treasury may, at any time, sell any of the bonds of the corporation acquired by him under this section. All redemptions, purchases, and sales by the Secretary of the Treasury of the bonds of the corporation shall be treated as public-debt transactions of the United States. Such bonds shall be fully and adequately secured by such assets of the corporation and in such manner as shall be prescribed by its board of directors. The corporation shall have power to purchase such bonds in the open market at any time and at any price. On such terms and conditions as may be agreed upon, the corporation may exchange such bonds, upon application of any Federal land bank for consolidated farm loan bonds of equal face value issued under the Federal Farm Loan Act, as amended, and may exchange such consolidated farm-loan bonds held by it for bonds of the corporation of equal face value.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 7, line 5, after the word "cash," to strike out "consolidated bonds of the 12

Federal land banks issued or to be issued under the provisions of the Federal Farm Loan Act, as amended," and insert " such consolidated farm-loan bonds "; in line 8, after the word " such ", to strike out " price " and insert " prices "; in line 10, after the word " corporation ", to strike out " and "; and, in line 11, after the word " bonds ", to insert a comma and " and to invest its funds in mortgage loans made under section 32 of the Emergency Farm Mortgage Act of 1933, as amended ", so as to read:

(b) The corporation is further authorized to purchase from time to time, for cash, such consolidated farm-loan bonds at such prices and upon such terms as may be approved by the board of directors of the corporation, to make loans to Federal land banks on the security of such consolidated bonds, and to invest its funds in mortgage loans made under section 32 of the Emergency Farm Mortgage Act of 1933, as amended.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 8, line 5, after the name " United States ", to strike out " but this provision shall not apply to the issuance of any bond to refinance " and insert " except for the purpose of refinancing ", so as to make the section read:

SEC. 5. After 90 days after the enactment of this act, no Federal land bank shall issue any bonds under the provisions of the last paragraph of section 32 of the Federal Farm Loan Act, as amended, subject to the guaranty of interest on such bonds by the United States, except for the purpose of refinancing any bond which is or has been issued subject to such guaranty of interest.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 8, line 12, before the word " may ", to strike out " or under section 32 of the Emergency Farm Mortgage Act of 1933," and, in line 13, after the word " bank ", to strike out " or the Land Bank Commissioner, as the case may be ", so as to make the section read:

SEC. 6. Direct loans made under section 7 of the Federal Farm Loan Act, as amended (U.S.C., sup. VII, title 12, sec. 723), may, at the option of the Federal land bank, be made in bonds of the Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 9, line 19, before the words " land bank ", to strike out " Upon issuance of the charter of the Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation, the " and insert " Until February 1, 1936, the "; in line 21, after the word " of ", to strike out " such corporation, and the mortgages and credit instruments secured thereby, together with the funds available to the Land Bank Commissioner under this section, are transferred to such corporation. The bonds and proceeds of bonds " and insert " the Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation either in cash or in bonds of the corporation at his election. Not to exceed $600,000,000 of the bonds and proceeds thereof "; and on page 10, line 5, after the word " section ", to strike out " but the face value of bonds which may be issued for such purposes shall not exceed $600,000,000 " and insert " in addition to the amounts transferred to such corporation under section 3 of such act ", so as to make the section read:

SEC. 9. Section 32 of the Emergency Farm Mortgage Act of 1933 (U.S.C., Supp. VII, title 12, sec. 1016) is amended by inserting at the end thereof the following: " Until February 1, 1936, the Land Bank Commissioner shall, in his name, make loans under this section on behalf of the Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation either in cash or in bonds of the corporation at his election. Not to exceed $600,000,000 of the bonds and proceeds thereof issued under section 4 of the Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation Act are hereby made available for the purposes of this section in addition to the amounts transferred to such corporation under section 3 of such act."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 13, after line 14, to strike out the following section:

SEC. 16. Subparagraph (b) of section 14 of the Federal Reserve Act, as amended, is further amended by adding the following after the semicolon at the end of such paragraph:

" To buy and sell bonds of the Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation having maturities from date of purchase of not exceeding 6 months, and to make loans on the security of bonds of the Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation subject to the limitations and restrictions respecting loans on the security of direct obligations of the United States issued under the Second Liberty Loan Act, as amended."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 14, to insert the following section:

SEC. 16 (a) The first sentence of the eighth paragraph of section 13 of the Federal Reserve Act, as amended, is further amended by inserting before the semicolon after the words " section 13 (a) of this act " a comma and the following: " or by the deposit or pledge of Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation bonds issued under the Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation Act."

(b) Paragraph (b) of section 14 of the Federal Reserve Act, as amended (U.S.C., title 12, secs. 353–358), is further amended by inserting after the words " bonds and notes of the United States " a comma and the following: " bonds of the Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation having maturities from date of purchase of not exceeding 6 months."

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendments reported by the committee have now been agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. I ask unanimous consent that the vote by which the amendment on page 3, beginning on line 15 and extending to the end of the paragraph, was agreed to may be reconsidered, and then I shall ask that the amendment be passed over temporarily for the purpose of enabling me to draw up an amendment which I desire to propose as a substitute.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the vote whereby the amendment referred to by the Senator from Missouri on page 3 was agreed to will be reconsidered, and the amendment will be passed over temporarily.

Mr. CONNALLY. I desire to call up an amendment. I think the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] will agree to it when it is read. I ask that the amendment be stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment offered by the Senator from Texas will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 14, after line 20, insert the following:

SEC. 16 (a) That the Governor of the Farm Credit Administration is authorized and directed, during the year 1934, to make loans to farmers of the same character and for the same purposes, and subject to the same terms and conditions (including penalties), as loans made during the year 1933 pursuant to the act entitled "An act to provide for loans to farmers for crop production and harvesting during the year 1933, and for other purposes ", approved February 4, 1933.

The Governor of the Farm Credit Administration is further authorized to make such rules and regulations as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act.

There is hereby authorized to be appropriated the sum of $100,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to carry out the provisions of this act.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I cannot agree to that amendment. The President and the Farm Credit Administration have been considering this subject with very great care. There is now pending in the Senate a bill proposed by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] relating to that subject, to which I expect certain amendments to be proposed by him, although, of course, I have no authority to commit the Senator from South Carolina to any amendments.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I should like to state in this connection that the terms of the amendment just proposed by the Senator from Texas are almost identical, with one exception, with the terms of the bill introduced by me. I see no reason, so far as I am individually concerned, why this amendment should not apply to the pending bill. If the Senator from Texas will allow me in his time, I should like to give the reasons for my position.

Mr. CONNALLY. May I interrupt the Senator from South Carolina for just a moment in order to answer a statement made by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]? Let me say to the Senator from Arkansas that I consulted the Senator from South Carolina before I introduced the amendment, and the amendment I proposed is entirely agreeable to him.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I did not know that this amendment was to be proposed. I think it is the theory of the Farm Credit Administration and the theory of the President that a reduction should be made in the amount authorized for the class of loans contemplated by the amendment, and I should like to ask the Senator from Texas to withhold his amendment until a day or two later, when the bill of the Senator from South Carolina may be brought forward and the opportunity to amend it will be afforded.

Quite a number of questions believed to be of very great importance are involved. The administration not only feels that there should be a reduction in the aggregate amount, but, inasmuch as we are setting up, and have set up, through credit corporations, arrangements for loans for those who are able to supply the collateral that is required in connection with crop production, a much less sum than that authorized in legislation of previous years will be adequate.

The Farm Credit Administration also feels that the aggregate amount of the loan to be made to any individual under these provisions, substantially without security, should be reduced from $300 to $200, as is now provided. These questions, however, I think, should be settled separately from the pending bill.

The Farm Relief Administration believes that the general provisions of the amendment and of the Smith bill may be advantageous, but it also feels that there should be certain restrictions adopted on these so-called "crop-production loans" which will result in a condition under which they may be abandoned some time in the early future.

The direct making of loans for the purpose of crop production is quite expensive, and it has involved some measure of fraud and waste; though, on the whole, it has been very helpful and very advantageous. My thought is that by considering the subject separately it can be worked out under conditions that ought to be satisfactory to most of us. For that reason, so far as I am concerned, I cannot consent to the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, if the Senator from Texas will allow me, I should like to review, briefly, what has transpired in reference to the continuance of crop-production loans based entirely upon the prospective crop to be produced.

I recognize, because of the conditions in my own State, and from the mail and communications of all sorts that have come to me on this subject, it is universally felt that it is necessary to have a continuance, until next year at least, of what is known as "crop-production loans." It was recognized by substantially every member of the Senate Committee on Agriculture, when the bill came up for consideration by that committee, that anywhere from 60 to 75 percent of the producers from Minnesota to South Carolina could not qualify under the conditions of the Farm Credit Administration as now set up, on account of the depression that has been affecting the farmers for much longer than it has been affecting industry. Every available financial and banking asset the farmers had, save the power to produce a crop, has already been involved. Therefore if they do not get funds for the purpose of producing their crops, and upon the crop as security, millions of farmers will have to be eliminated from anything like tilling the soil and making a crop.

Previous to the enactment of the Farm Credit Act setting up institutions in which stock had to be bought, security given and financial statements made, the previous administration had tried almost the identical thing, and the result was that the number subscribing was negligent, not because the seed loan that was then being made offered a better opportunity to get the money but because the farmers were totally unable to put up any security. They are required to take 5 percent in stock out of any loan which they hope to negotiate; they pay 6-percent interest; they then pay a certain amount for the examination of the papers and recording of the mortgage, and the result is that a negligible number of the farmers can qualify.

Mr. Morgenthau went down to the capital city of my State and outlined the provisions of his bill. When he had finished Mr. Hugh McCrae, perhaps one of the most progressive citizens in the State of North Carolina, interested as he was, and as all of us are, in the submerged helpless element in the agricultural world, said to Mr. Morgenthau—I am quoting approximately—

> I have listened to your proposition, and I want to state that in North Carolina and South Carolina my opinion is that 75 percent of those who produce the crops cannot qualify under this bill.

Mr. TYDINGS. Why?

Mr. SMITH. Because they have not anything except some rented land and their muscle with which to make a crop; that is why.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas permit me to ask the Senator from South Carolina a question?

Mr. CONNALLY. I am very glad to do so.

Mr. McKELLAR. Is it not also true that while the crop-production organization which is now being set up may in the end reach the purpose desired, for this year, at all events, it is impossible for it to begin operating in sufficient time to allow the farmers to borrow the money with which to make a crop, and therefore under any circumstances is it not essential that it should be done this year?

Mr. CONNALLY. It should be done by the 1st of February.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, we are spending billions of dollars—I will not attempt to enumerate the sources of expenditures, for every Senator knows that vast sums are being expended in the effort to eliminate unemployment.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I may not have a correct understanding of what the effect would be if the amendment were added to this bill, but, as I understand, the Senator from Texas offers an amendment to the pending bill the effect of which, if agreed to and enacted into law, would be practically the same as though the bill reported from the Agricultural Committee, about which the Senator from South Carolina is talking, were itself enacted into law. Am I correct in that?

Mr. SMITH. That is correct.

Mr. NORRIS. The objection of the Senator from Arkansas to the amendment ought to be considered, because he says, in effect, as I understand him, that those who are to administer the measure want to suggest some amendment or change in the bill of the Senator from South Carolina. I should like to ask the Senator from Arkansas if I am correct in that surmise?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator is entirely correct. I undertook to state some of the amendments which they propose to that bill. The statement made by the Senator from Nebraska, it seems to me, is reenforced by the fact that no opportunity was afforded the Farm Credit Administration to discuss this question. It came up since this bill was reported by the committee.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to suggest, then——

Mr. SMITH. Before the Senator from Nebraska proceeds let me correct a statement which has just been made. I notified Governor Myers, and he came to my office and brought members of his staff with him. I discussed this question with him.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. May I ask if that was before or after the bill had been reported?

Mr. SMITH. That was after the bill had been reported.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. That is what I said. Before the bill was reported there was no opportunity afforded for discussion.

Mr. NORRIS. There were no hearings before the committee, as I understand.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. There were no hearings before the committee.

Mr. NORRIS. May I suggest that I was present at the committee meeting at which was unanimously ordered reported the bill introduced by the Senator from South Carolina. I still think that that action was right, but I do not want to foreclose anybody from making proper suggestions or having a hearing on it. I should like to suggest to the Senator from Texas that he follow the suggestion of the Senator from Arkansas and bring up his amendment when we take up the bill of the Senator from South Carolina, which I understand is to be considered in a few days. I think the bill is proper, so far as I now know, and I want to support it and vote for it, but I do not want to foreclose anybody from suggesting amendments.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I want right here and now not to let the impression go out too strongly that I have not attempted to secure the opinion of the administration.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not know anything about that.

Mr. SMITH. I am going to tell the Senator about it.

Mr. NORRIS. I will be glad to hear the Senator's statement.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. SMITH. Not at this moment.

Mr. NORRIS. When the bill was up before the committee we had no hearings.

Mr. SMITH. Exactly, but not a single member of the committee thought any hearing was necessary because of the exigent conditions which every Senator knows exist in his State, conditions demanding relief. We did not think that the provisions of the bill heretofore enacted and the one here now about to be enacted needed any comment, for we ourselves knew what the actual conditions were.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH. Let me first make this statement: I then sought an interview with the President. I wanted to discuss the question with him and show him the necessity of this proposed legislation and explain to him that it met the crying needs of more than 50 percent of those who produce the crops of this country. I have been unable to get an audience with him. I have been a Member of this body for a quarter of a century; I think I have tried to discharge my duty as a Senator; I have tried to deal fairly with all parties concerned, and I felt it to be my duty to take the action I did take in behalf of the suffering farmers of this country, not those who are able to purchase the shares of stock and who can show a financial condition indicating an ability to guarantee the loans but those who have nothing in the world but their own physical ability to produce crops.

I think that category includes 75 percent of those who produce the bulk of our agricultural products; and representing them, knowing that time was of the essence, the committee reported the bill. On account of the change in the Constitution, brought about by the Senator from Nebraska, we did not have time to discuss this question previous to Christmas. I should have introduced the bill then had the Congress been in session. The measure is simply designed to give the farmers what for the last 5 years they have considered the most efficient, the most practicable of any relief that has been afforded them at any time; and, be it said to the honor of that distressed class in my State, in Georgia, and in North Carolina—three States with which I am particularly familiar—90 percent plus of the loans have been repaid, despite the low prices and the horrible depression. The Senator from Texas, recognizing in his State the same condition, introduced a measure simply containing direct aid to these distressed individuals.

Mr. CONNALLY. In the form of loans.

Mr. SMITH. Yes; in the form of loans, just as in the past.

Mr. President, if the Senate will bear with me for just a second further, for 10 years we have tried crop-production credit units in the several States. We tried that plan under the cooperative principle. We then tried it under the sanction of law, in the case of the Farm Board under the Hoover administration, the provisions of which were almost identical with those of the pending bill. It has been a signal failure; it has been a disastrous failure. Why? I myself went in and took stock; I then paid 6-percent discount; I then paid from 2 to 2½ percent for the examination and recording of the papers; and the next year, or perhaps the year following, the whole thing dissolved, and I had the pleasure of paying anywhere from 15 to 17 percent for the money that I borrowed, guaranteeing it with everything that I had that had not been previously mortgaged. Everything was cleaned up.

They required a chattel mortgage and a financial statement showing what one was worth, what his rating was; and if one could give a satisfactory financial statement, and, in addition to that, put up enough chattels, enough real estate—God knows they took everything he had—then he might borrow, but if a farmer borrows under the old law they take 10 percent, and then the fees for recording.

I maintain today that from Minnesota—and the Senator from Minnesota endorsed the proposition as enthusiastically as did the Senator from South Carolina——

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. MURPHY. Did I understand the Senator to say that he was doing business with a pawnbroker or with the Federal Government?

Mr. SMITH. I was doing business with the Farm Credit organization.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. I do not know what the Senator's experience in South Carolina has been, but I am very credibly informed that in some counties in Missouri the Agricultural Credit Administration, that is, the land bank at St. Louis, has taken more money out of the county in fees than it has put in in the shape of loans.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, let us consider the bill introduced by me, which with one exception is exactly identical with the bill of the Senator from Texas. We have set up an organization which takes the application of the small farmer, the one-horse man, the renter. The agent of the organization goes out and examines the land. The organization graduates the risk according to the farmer's prospects. They give him a part of the loan to begin work. They give him enough to buy his fertilizer. Then a little later, if he is keeping things moving, they send him enough to cultivate; then at last give him enough more to help him complete the crop. Then they take the crop and put it to his credit.

Ninety-seven percent of the farmers have paid out in my State. They buy no stock; they put up no collateral except the prospective crop, upon which everyone of us in this Chamber is dependent. That condition extends from the semitropical regions of South Carolina to the frozen regions of the North and Northwest. This plan has the universal approval of every farmer and everyone that thinks in terms of the man who cannot put up banking collateral.

Governor Myers said to me, "Do you not think that the land rental the farmer has and the option stuff he has would enable him to qualify under my proposition and not under yours?" I said, "You are going upon the assumption that he has made a profit." He did get more for his tobacco and more for his cotton, perhaps, but the intolerable debt that was on him wiped out all possible profit. He would never pay off at the present price of cotton and tobacco—never in the world. As rapidly as the prices rise, those to whom he is indebted and who hold a mortgage on him are absorbing every dollar, and so he is identically in the same position that he was in last year as far as being able to make a financial statement and his ability to pay cash is concerned.

There is no use for us to mock that man. I am perfectly willing to hear what Mr. Myers has to say about his theory. Mr. Hoover had the same theory, and the cooperatives had it, but it will not work. If a farmer has money enough and property enough to be a good risk, he is not going to join a coterie of four or five and to extend the 5-percent guaranty to insure whether the other fellow will pay up or not. If he had money to do that, he would go to the bank and borrow. If not, he will take his own assets and go to the grocery man and the fertilizer man and make his note and give them a mortgage.

What is the use to stand here as practical men and mock these people? I repeat, I talked to Mr. Myers. I knew beforehand what his idea was about cutting down the amount. I am perfectly willing, if $100,000,000 is too much in the opinion of the Senate, to reduce the amount; but, in the name of the people that need food and clothing, why do we balk at $100,000,000 for the farmers of America and then pay out $500,000,000 for work simply to give people employment? What better employment can we give in this land than to lend the farmer enough money to enable him to stay on his farm and maintain his self-respect, his dignity as a citizen, humble though it may be, and then pay it back, as he always has done, to the full extent of his ability?

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas has the floor. Does he yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. CONNALLY. I am glad to yield.

Mr. SMITH. I thought the Senator from Texas had yielded the floor to me; otherwise I should not have continued as I have. I shall wait until such time as I can get the floor in my own right.

Mr. CONNALLY. I am not complaining about the Senator's interruption.

Mr. NYE. I followed with a great deal of interest the thought the Senator from South Carolina has expressed with relation to the need of the farmer at this time. He speaks of the renter as being the primary one in need. I know of owners of farms who are just as desperately needing the help as any renter.

Mr. SMITH. I was not restricting my remarks to renters.

Mr. NYE. I want to ask a question of the Senator from Texas and the Senator from South Carolina. Do they feel that to take action on the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas today is going to delay these loans to a time when they will be exceedingly late in getting to those who need them?

Mr. SMITH. I have a telegram here on my desk that is typical of hundreds. This happens to be from Minnesota. The telegram expresses the thought which I have expressed here, that time is rapidly passing and whatever they are going to get they want to get promptly. In other words, time is of the essence.

Mr. NYE. The Senator knows what has been the experience every winter and spring. We have always been late in affording these loans. We have acted ultimately, but it has been too late to be properly executed. Does the Senator feel that a failure to accept the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas at this time is going to occasion delay that is going to be embarrassing again?

Mr. SMITH. Speaking for myself alone, I am inclined to let those who are now administering it determine that question. I have said my say here. I have expressed myself. I want to make the further statement that I believe it is the duty of the committees of the Senate and the House to draft the legislation which they propose to enact. I think it would be all right to invite the different departments to come in and make suggestions born of their experience in administering the law, but I for one would like for this body and the body at the other end of the Capitol to draft their own legislation. We are the legislative body. It is not that I care so much about the matter of authorship nor that I have any pride of authorship, but I do want to maintain the dignity of the legislative branch of our Government.

I think I know as much about the condition of the suffering farmers of the country as the bankers know about the horrible condition of the suffering bankers. I think I know as much about the condition of the average farmer as the manufacturers know about the condition of the manufacturers. But the farmer seems to have very few voices raised here in his behalf.

Mr. NYE. Have hearings been set for consideration of the Senator's bill?

Mr. SMITH. No; we did not have any hearings. The only hearing we had was the enthusiastic and unanimous endorsement of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. NYE. I understand there is now a request to be heard in connection with the matter.

Mr. SMITH. All I am pleading for is that as time is of the essence we should get some relief to the class of people that are in need of relief and who are so splendidly struggling, remembering all the time how splendidly they have heretofore responded in paying back these loans.

I have introduced the bill and it has been reported. The committee unanimously and enthusiastically endorsed it. It is now before the Senate, in the hands of the Senate, and whatever the Senate may see proper to do I shall accept, of course.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, in reply to the suggestions of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], I want to say that the reason I offered the amendment at this time without calling it to the attention of the Senator from Arkansas specifically is that he was on the floor at the time addressing the Senate. I introduced the measure independently on the 10th of January and it was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], chairman of the committee, had a similar bill, almost identical in its text, and the committee unanimously reported his bill. Under those circumstances I first consulted the Senator from South Carolina before offering my amendment to this bill because I wanted to be courteous to him. He agreed that I should offer my amendment.

The reason why I did not call it to the attention of the Senator from Arkansas was that he was on the floor at the time explaining the general measure. I did, however, offer the amendment from the floor in advance for information. Of course I do not want to run counter to the wishes of the Senator from Arkansas. If we can have some understanding or agreement that the Smith bill will be taken up within a few days and disposed of, I shall not press my amendment at this time, because of the request of the Senator from Arkansas that it be not pressed. I have no disposition to be insistent about the matter at this time, but I do want to make a brief statement.

So far as the total amount is concerned, I am willing to scale that, because it will not be necessary this year to employ quite as large an amount of funds, for some of these loans will be made under the other set-up; and I am willing, so far as I am concerned, to have the amount that may be loaned to each individual borrower amended. By the way, section 2 of the amendment provides that the Governor of the Farm Credit Administration shall make rules and regulations regarding its administration. We are not undertaking to tie his hands; but all that the amendment does is to continue for 1 more year the crop loans just as they have been made for the past year.

The present arrangement expires by limitation of time; and unless something of this kind is enacted, the tenants without substantial property cannot borrow from the Federal Government under the new set-up. Under the new set-up the law requires that the farmer, in order to get a loan for crop-production purposes, must have "adequate security." If he has adequate security, he can go to the bank and get the money; but the farmer who merely has a team and implements and has the prospect of a crop will not be able to borrow any money whatever from the Farm Credit Administration for crop production under the new set-up.

This amendment of mine simply authorizes and directs the Governor of the Farm Credit Administration to continue these crop loans for another year.

What is the effect?

The crop loans during the past year in many States have been paid back to the Treasury more than 90 percent. My State has paid back more than 90 percent of those loans. These loans will prevent some people from going on the relief rolls. They will be on direct relief, getting doles from the Federal Treasury, or they will be on work created by the Civil Works Administration. This is the cheapest form of relief that it is possible for the Government to give, because it enables the farmer to stay at home, to be busy, to make a crop to sustain himself and his family; and the Government in most cases does not lose a thin dime on these loans.

The Committee on Agriculture and Forestry having reported the bill unanimously, and having understood that it was going to come up at some future day, I thought that, the Senate having before it an amendment to the Agricultural Administration Act—that is the bill we now have before us—it was appropriate that the other bill should be offered as an amendment now. I failed to consult the Senator from Arkansas only because he was on the floor addressing the Senate, and I did not want to interrupt him. I consulted the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] and the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], and asked the Senator from Tennessee, who sits by the Senator from Arkansas, to consult him and see if he would not accept the amendment.

Let me ask the Senator from Arkansas at this juncture whether he thinks we can get up the Smith bill in a few days if this matter is not pressed now.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I stated in my opening statement on this amendment that I expected that we would be able, in all probability, to agree on a modification of the Smith bill, and that there was no disposition on the part of anyone to delay it. I decline to be put in the attitude of resenting the action of the Senator from Texas in offering this amendment, and I decline also to enter into a bargain on the matter.

Mr. CONNALLY. I do not ask that.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I think that this matter necessarily will be determined on its merits. I have no doubt that the bill may be speedily considered, as I have said to the Senator from South Carolina. He understands fully that there is no disposition, here or elsewhere, to delay consideration of the bill; but there are subjects involved in this matter that I have not yet fully explained and that I will seek to explain when the opportunity arises.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, let me say in reply to the Senator from Arkansas that the Senator from Texas, in explaining why he did not call the amendment to the attention of the Senator from Arkansas, did not mean to imply that there was any resentment on the part of the Senator from Arkansas; but the Senator did say that his attention had not been called to the amendment. That was why the Senator from Texas was explaining why he did not call it to the attention of the Senator from Arkansas. I am not trying to extort any agreement from the Senator; but since I am giving way, and not pressing the amendment, I did hope that we could have the parties who are interested know that this matter would be given attention.

I thank the Senator from Arkansas for his statement with regard to the matter; and under those circumstances, I shall not insist on the amendment at this time.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator withdraws the amendment, as I understand?

Mr. CONNALLY. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, while this matter is under consideration, let me say that I think the Senator from Texas has done right and acted wisely in withdrawing his amendment.

I wish to make a further explanation for the benefit of those who are interested in this very important controversy.

The Congress, by the Farm Credit Act, authorized the setting up of certain farm credit agencies, known as "farm credit corporations." It is the policy of the act to make loans to farmers on as sound and reasonable a basis as may be practicable, and I do not believe any Senator ought to object to that. It is the policy of the administration, and it is the policy of the laws we have already enacted, to discontinue as soon as may be making loans without security to farmers who are able to give reasonable security.

The importance of this is well illustrated by my good friend the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], who implied in his statement that he was not able to make a sound loan with the Government and that he had to depend on one of these crop-production loans made without security.

Mr. President, there are thousands of people in this country engaged in farming who last year got the benefits of this act when they ought to have been permitted to obtain loans under different conditions. I submit that the fact that only $58,000,000 were loaned last year, when the authorization was $100,000,000, shows that there is an effort to swell this class of loans unduly. Of course, if last year was not the worst year, insofar as crop production is concerned, we shall have to ask God to save the country.

With an authorization of $100,000,000, $58,000,000 were loaned. There were many instances where people who were able to finance themselves procured these loans with but slight cost. There were other instances where various forms of fraud were practiced. The idea is to accept the principle of the bill introduced by the Senator from South Carolina and the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas, but to limit the loans so that only those who from a business standpoint are fairly entitled to them may be able to obtain them.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Just a moment.

It is the thought of those who have studied the matter that approximately half the amount that was actually expended last year would be adequate for the purposes of this particular class of loans.

The Senator from South Carolina refers to balking at a mere $100,000,000. The difficulty about that is that every time we authorize the expenditure of $100,000,000 for a laudable and commendable purpose it becomes the precedent or basis for the expenditure of $500,000,000 for some other equally laudable and commendable purpose; so that there is no limit to what the Government may be called on to do in the extension of its credit, and we have almost reached the maximum point.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield first to the Senator from Texas. Then I will yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, allow me to say to the Senator from Arkansas that I am not in disagreement with his idea that the amount probably is larger than is necessary.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. And yet the Senator asked for $100,000,000 when only $58,000,000 were loaned last year.

Mr. CONNALLY. Yes; but I will say to the Senator that the Farm Credit Administration are sitting over there, and they are not supposed to dish out this money unless it is warranted. We have to trust somebody, however.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. SMITH. I asked for $200,000,000. That was appropriated. Out of the $200,000,000, because of the care exercised and the judicious investigation of the different persons applying, I do not think we used in excess of eighty-odd millions. Last year I think the authorization and appropriation extended to $100,000,000; and on account of the care with which the local people in the counties and in the localities and in the States investigated these individuals, they used only about $60,000,000 of the $100,000,000. In addition to that, they cut down the amount that any one individual could get to a point where, in the judgment of the local committee, the crop would amply repay it. The result was that in some cases the amount loaned to the individual was so ridiculously small that they had to review their loans.

I desire to state to the Senator from Arkansas and other Members of my party that in my State I have never seen any loans made that were so carefully guarded as to the prospect of the crop and the individuals who got them; and I do not believe there are a half-dozen cases in the entire State where the borrower has not responded without any attempt to evade the law or to defraud the Government.

I make the assertion that, taking into consideration the character of the loans, the manner in which they are made, and the individuals to whom they are made, there is a smaller percentage of fraud than in the case of any other class of loans made in all the history of this country. I propose to get the statistics, to find out how many borrowers there have been, the total amount borrowed, and how many were suspected of or indicted for fraud.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arkansas yield to me?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think the arrangement which has just been made by which this amendment is withdrawn from the bill is satisfactory, in view of the fact it is the understanding that we are to have the Smith bill or the Connally bill before us in a day or two, or in a very short time. I wish to emphasize the very great necessity of having the seed-loan office measure passed as soon as possible.

Mr. President, I want to say that I think that these direct loans as carried on by the seed-loan offices are very beneficial to a class of our citizens who otherwise could not make a crop, and which group would probably go on the indigent list but for such loans. They have been a great success in the State in which I live. In the States of Arkansas, Mississippi, Alabama, and Tennessee, which are comprised in our district, these loans have been quite a success. Considerably above 90 percent of the loans have been paid back this year, and they have uniformly been well paid back. It is very necessary in every way for the Government to make these loans and I am very happy that we are to have a vote on the Smith or Connally bill very soon.

There is just one other thing I want to mention. Something was said about changes in the bill. The Government loaned about $58,000,000 last year through these seed-loan offices. Naturally when the bill which we are to pass today gets into operation those loans will not be as great. I think the idea expressed to me by Governor Meyer was that probably $50,000,000 will be all that will be necessary, and perhaps not quite as much as that. But certainly for this year, before the corporation now being organized gets into full force and effect, it is very necessary to supplement that measure by continuing the seed-loan offices for at least another year, and I hope that will be agreed to by the department. These direct loans are vitally necessary to large groups of small farmers who cannot secure the money necessary to make a crop in any other way. The loss to the Government on these loans is small, and to this group of smaller farmers these loans are vital. We must not discontinue them.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I have just one other thought to bring to the attention of Senators. We are, in a sense, establishing competition between two Government agencies in the making of these loans. We are making the class of loans referred to in the Smith bill and the Connally amendment much easier than those under the provisions of the Farm Credit Act, which means, of course, that we will impliedly invite everyone who can do so to bring himself under the classification of the easier loans. The fair thing to do, it seems to me, is to limit the amount of this class of loans to be made to those who are not able to meet the requirements of other provisions of the law.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS. I seek information from the able Senator from Arkansas. First, let me assure him that it is asserted that in the State of Illinois there are more tenant farmers in proportion to owners of land than in any other State of the Union. I am not able to verify that; I merely give the information as given me.

I ask the Senator, does the new bill, that referred to as suggested from the Senator from South Carolina, or any of the amendments, or the bill presented by the Senator from Arkansas, change the prospect of the tenant farmer to obtain a loan where he has no security?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I do not understand that the Smith bill or the Connally amendment makes any change in the existing rules and regulations applicable to crop-production loans.

Mr. LEWIS. The provisions which have heretofore permitted or now permit those who have no security to offer, tenant farmers, to borrow, still remain, as far as the new legislation is concerned?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Of course, the new legislation has not been enacted yet; it could be changed; but, so far as the proposals themselves go, they would not change that situation in any important particular.

Mr. LEWIS. I thank the Senator.

Mr. CLARK. I desire to offer an amendment to the latter part of the committee amendment, on lines 18 to 21, page 3.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from Missouri proposes to strike out that portion of the amendment beginning with the word "Provided" in line 18, page 3, and continuing to the end of the paragraph, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

Provided, That no person who has been heretofore, or may hereafter be, appointed as an agent, officer, or employee under the Farm Credit Administration, and no person who may be appointed as an agent, officer, or employee of the corporation under this act, shall receive a salary of $4,000 or more per annum, except with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, the purpose of that amendment is simply to reduce the limit provided by the committee amendment from $6,000 a year to $4,000 a year, and to extend the provision not only to the employees, agents, and officers provided for the corporation under this bill but also to the employees, officers, and agents appointed under the Farm Credit Administration under the legislation heretofore passed.

The purpose is perfectly obvious. In the land bank in St. Louis there are employed, under the present Agricultural Credit Administration set-up, 22 men drawing $5,000 a year or more each. Many of them, however, would not be included in the terms of the committee amendment as their salaries are not in excess of $6,000 per annum.

I think the Senator from Arkansas will agree that in the Federal land bank district, of which his State and mine are included, together with the State represented so ably by the distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], the agricultural credit relief which Congress aimed at and desired to provide for has largely failed of its purpose by reason of the personnel which has been continued in office by the Federal Credit Administration.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK. I gladly yield.

Mr. WHEELER. I was going to say to the Senator that what has happened in his district, apparently, has likewise happened in the Federal land bank at Spokane, Wash.

Mr. CLARK. I have been advised by many Senators that the same thing has happened in their districts.

Mr. WHEELER. I do not think we ought to let these Federal land banks become political machines.

Mr. CLARK. I agree entirely with the Senator upon that point.

Mr. WHEELER. In my own State they appointed about 200 appraisers, and out of that 200 appraisers whom they appointed, over 95 percent were Republicans. In other words, there they are building up a Republican political machine with the Federal land bank, under a Democratic administration.

Mr. CLARK. Precisely that situation exists in our district, and it must inevitably exist when men who were originally appointed to office as a part of a political machine are left in power.

Mr. WHEELER. It is not only happening in that department, but it has likewise happened under the Agricultural Credit Corporation, and under the various other set-ups which have been made of that kind throughout the Northwest.

Mr. CLARK. Let me say this, it is not to the political complexion of this set-up that I am now directing attention, but the men who make up the official personnel of the Federal land bank in St. Louis were for the most part originally trained in that school of extreme deflationists headed by Eugene Meyer and Paul Bestor, the latter of whom came from Missouri, and who knew the people of the deflationist group in Missouri, Arkansas, and Illinois well enough to select them for that service.

Those men were trained in the school of valuing farm lands on the basis of the lowest agricultural prices in history. They believed then, and from their actions probably still believe, that the proper basis for valuing farm land would be 3-cent cotton, 10-cent corn, and 25-cent wheat, and for the most part they have pursued that policy since they have been in office, even including their service under the present administration.

I know that many of these men who were appointed in the St. Louis land bank could not have been confirmed in the Senate if it had been necessary to bring their names into the Senate and if opportunity had been given for the presentation of complaints against them.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I have been detained in a meeting of the Committee on Banking and Currency, and I have not read the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri. Does it provide that all employees who are appointed in the various land banks by the boards and the executive officials of the land banks must be confirmed by the Senate?

Mr. CLARK. It relates to those appointed under the Agricultural Credit Administration.

Mr. BARKLEY. I understand, but many of those appointments are not made by the President; they are not made by the Federal administration in Washington; they are made locally, by the executive officers of the land banks.

Mr. CLARK. I understand that, but they are not officials of the Agricultural Credit Administration; they are officials of the land banks.

Mr. BARKLEY. Does the Senator's amendment include all such employees or officers who may be chosen by the boards of the separate land banks?

Mr. CLARK. It would include anybody who is paid out of the Federal Treasury.

Mr. BARKLEY. If that is true, I could not support the Senator's amendment. I think I voted in the last Congress for an amendment which the Senator from Missouri offered with reference to general appointees of the President or of the executive departments in Washington, but if his amendment is broad enough to make it necessary, where a lawyer who is to be paid upon appointment by the president of a Federal land bank, or the bank of a cooperative, or an intermediate credit bank, any of these banks located out over the country, to have his name sent here by the President and confirmed, so that they could not make any appointments of employees and pay them more than the amount fixed without confirmation by the Senate, I think the Senator's amendment goes entirely too far.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I am glad that the Senator mentioned the case of the attorney. We have a general counsel appointed for the Agricultural Credit Administration at St. Louis, who, I am informed, never tried a lawsuit in his life; yet he has been brought in there and is to be paid a salary of $7,500 a year. I think an appointment of that importance should require confirmation by the Senate.

Mr. BARKLEY. I will say to the Senator from Missouri that I believe that after all the responsibility for operating these land banks successfully and efficiently rests upon the heads of the land banks in the districts. I am not acquainted with any mistakes of judgment or anything else that have been made in the different land banks throughout the country, but I do think that if the Senator's amendment provides that the officers who are charged with the responsibility of conducting the land banks in the various districts cannot make an appointment of that sort without it coming into the Senate, that he will merely handicap them in the operation of this system.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, may I say to the Senator from Missouri that I think his amendment, if agreed to, would have to be so modified as not to apply to officers and agents of the land banks, because——

Mr. CLARK. It was my thought, Mr. President, when I provided in the amendment for employees and agents of the Agricultural Credit Corporation that I was excluding employees of the land banks. What I am particularly directing the amendment at, Mr. President, is the office of general agent under the Farm Credit Administration.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, if the Senator from Missouri will modify his amendment so as to make it apply to only employees under the particular act now under consideration and not be retroactive, I should be glad to accept the amendment and let it go to conference.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, does the Senator from Arkansas mean to say that even if the amendment is modified as suggested by him, it still carries with it the provisions that nominations of all subordinate appointees in the local banks must be sent to the Senate?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Oh, no. The suggestion is with reference to the employees under this act, separate and apart from acts heretofore passed. The Senator from Missouri and the Senator from Kentucky will recall that when the Farm Credit Act was under consideration the Senate incorporated an amendment making the employees of the Farm Credit Administration itself largely subject to confirmation by the Senate; and that amendment was eliminated in conference, as I remember it.

The effect of the amendment as proposed by the Senator from Missouri is retroactive. In addition to that, what has been said by the Senator from Kentucky is well sustained. The land banks appoint their own officers, employees, registers, deputy registers, examiners, reviewing appraisers, and so forth, and necessarily, within the limitations of law, fix their compensation. The land banks, while receiving the benefits of Federal legislation and of Federal funds provided for them, are still, in the theory of law, private institutions. So I am suggesting to the Senator from Missouri that for the present he modify his amendment so as to limit it to this act and amending the committee amendment by reducing to $4,000 instead of $6,000, and let the amendment go to conference.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, does the Senator from Missouri yield?

Mr. CLARK. I yield.

Mr. BYRNES. I really doubt whether the amendments of the Senator from Missouri will accomplish what he desires to accomplish if his purpose be to affect the general agent; because my understanding of the Farm Credit Act is that that officer is appointed upon the suggestion of the Governor of the Farm Credit Administration, but the suggestion must be acted upon by the directors of the land bank in the appointment by the local officials, and by the language of the amendment as I recall it, as has been read at the desk, I do not think the Senator would effect the purpose he has in mind.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Will the Senator from Missouri yield further?

Mr. CLARK. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I wish to say that when the Farm Credit Act was first passed, there appeared to be unreasonable delay in its administration, but loans, for some weeks, have been approved in large numbers. It is true that, for one reason or another, in every jurisdiction with which I am familiar the employees and agents under the act are Republicans. In some places they are nearly all Republicans.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I will yield in just a moment. These appointments were made on the theory that politics had nothing to do with the matter, but the individuals who were making the appointments were themselves Republicans, and quite naturally they thought it was politics, damnable politics, to appoint a Democratic appraiser or officer, but patriotism to keep a Republican or to appoint a Republican.

I do not for one moment subscribe to the doctrine that the land banks ought to be politically controlled and managed; but that is just exactly what has taken place almost from the beginning in most of the jurisdictions; and since March the 4th great resentment has been expressed by some in charge of these land banks that suggestions should be made from political sources as to who should be appointed among this great number of employees. At the same time they come with their hats in their hands, crawling on their knees, begging the Congress to provide Federal funds to enable the institutions with which they are associated to function efficiently.

I think that what the Senator from Missouri ought to do, in all fairness, is to limit his amendment to this act, and let such further modifications of the law take their chances as the statutes affected by them arise.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Arkansas that I am willing to accept that suggestion, and to so modify the amendment; because I realize that the amendment was hastily and, perhaps, crudely drawn, and that it should be drawn with extreme care in order to accomplish the purposes for which it was designed.

I desire, however, to give notice that at the proper time I intend to introduce, either as a separate measure or as an amendment to future legislation, an amendment designed to accomplish the purpose here sought. In line with what the Senator from Arkansas said, the Senator from Arkansas knows as well as I do that in our district, at least, the appointments to all of this land bank set-up were originally made by Arthur M. Hyde, the former Secretary of Agriculture. Mr. President, it is a strange coincidence that out of the 22 men in the St. Louis Land Bank to whom I referred a while ago drawing $5,000 a year, or better, 16 of them are Republicans and 3 are very doubtful Democrats. That sort of thing could not happen by accident, Mr. President. It was accomplished by design.

When people come along and talk about partisanship being injected into an objection to perpetuation of such a regime as that, it seems to me to be preposterous.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, does the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. I will say to the Senator that not only did the same thing happen in Montana, but I am told that exactly the same crowd that dominated the Federal land bank in the Minnesota and St. Paul district—all Republicans—all dominated, if you please, by the chain banks—are still dominating, and they are still dominating it in Montana. The people out there are expecting a new deal, and they are getting the same kind of a deal that they got from the Republicans, as far as that crowd is concerned.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment I previously offered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] is withdrawn.

Mr. CLARK. I move to amend the committee amendment in line 20, page 3, by striking out the numeral "6" and inserting the numeral "4."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota wish to speak on the bill?

Mr. FRAZIER. I do.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair recognizes the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] if he feels that the guaranteeing of these bonds would have a tendency to lower the rate of interest to the farmers who borrow the money?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. There is a possibility that that may be done. The rate prescribed in the bill is not to exceed 5 percent per annum—that is the rate under existing law—and, of course, the rate may be reduced below 5 percent.

Mr. FRAZIER. As I understand, the rate of interest that the land-bank bonds are to bear is not to exceed 4 percent. The guaranteeing of the principal of the bonds might have a tendency, of course, to lower the rate of interest a little bit; say, a half of 1 percent.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes. If the reduction is made, the benefits are passed on to the borrower.

Mr. FRAZIER. That is true under the terms of the bill; but I doubt whether it would have a tendency toward lowering the interest rate on the bonds. Be that as it may, I have no objection to guaranteeing the bonds. In the bill that was passed at the special session last spring, in my estimation, the rate of interest provided is too high to the farmer, and he cannot, under existing conditions, at least, pay that high a rate of interest.

Furthermore, the appraisal value under existing law is not liberal enough, and the result has been that literally thousands and tens of thousands of farmers have been denied and had their applications for loans turned down during these past few months, and the result will be that those farmers will lose their lands and their homes by foreclosure. I intend to press the bill that I have introduced for refinancing of farm indebtedness that is now pending in the Committee on Agriculture and to get it reported, which provides a more liberal rate of interest and easier terms of payment. I have no objection to guaranteeing the bonds.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the amendments be engrossed and the bill be read a third time?

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas, the bill (S. 2225) to provide for the establishment of a corporation to aid in the refinancing of farm debts, and for other purposes, was ordered to be indefinitely postponed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. NYE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I inquire if the Senator from Arkansas intends that the Senate shall now go back into executive session?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I am not advised as to whether or not there is any Senator who is ready to discuss the treaty.

Mr. NYE. Then, Mr. President, if I may be recognized, I should like to speak, though I hope briefly, with respect to certain questions arising out of the N.R.A. controversy which I had recently with General Johnson.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas desire the floor?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. No; I am entirely content that other Senators shall proceed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate has no business before it at the moment.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Then, Mr. President, I suggest that we proceed out of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Senate will proceed out of order. The Senator from North Dakota is recognized.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I am compelled to leave the Chamber for a few minutes, and I should like to be called if the Senator from Montana, the Senator from Ohio, and the Senator from North Dakota shall conclude their remarks before I shall be able to return.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, for the information of the Senator from Arkansas, I will say that I expect to speak only about 25 or 30 minutes.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me? I will say to the Senator that I have an appointment at the Treasury Department, and I should like to occupy a few moments to read a letter which I hold in my hand and then to make a few comments.

Mr. NYE. I shall be glad to yield the floor to the Senator from Montana for that purpose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. NYE. I yield.

REMONETIZATION OF SILVER

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senate to a very unusual thing that has happened with reference to the Burgess Battery Co. The Burgess Battery Co. is one of the oldest established manufacturers of batteries in the United States. The president of the Burgess Battery Co. was at one time, as I understand, a professor of economics in the University of Wisconsin. The company has plants at Freeport, Ill., Madison, Wis., Moline, Ill., Niagara Falls, Ontario, Winnipeg, Manitoba, and have offices in Chicago, New York, Boston, Atlanta, Detroit, Minneapolis, Kansas City, San Francisco, Los Angeles, and throughout the United States as well as in Canada. I am in receipt this morning of a letter from Mr. Burgess, chairman of the board of directors of the Burgess Battery Co., and its affiliates. His letter reads as follows:

FREEPORT, ILL., January 16, 1934.

Hon. BURTON K. WHEELER,
United States Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR WHEELER: For some time I have been watching with sympathy your effort to remonetize silver at a fixed ratio to gold. Through the long course of the fight to restore silver again to the status of a primary backing for our currency, so great a smoke screen of misinformation and fallacy has come to becloud the issue that, to the average citizen, a straw man labeled silver has hidden the true aspect of this natural material for money. Far too many of our citizens believe that to remonetize silver would be to destroy the purchasing power of the dollar.

There are those of us who are naturally conservative in the true sense of the word. To us true conservatism means that decisions and their consequent action should be based upon information and knowledge tempered by experience. Information and knowledge show us that an insufficient basis for the currency and credit structure leads to extremely dangerous fiat money without any primary money to act as a common denominator. Experience in the history of both the United States and the world at large has shown us that when established as a primary money at a fixed ratio to gold, there is enough silver to back the world's currency but not enough to allow for any intemperate and damaging inflation. The natural scarcity of silver acts as a brake on inflation, but still provides enough leeway to carry the currency and credit superstructure.

I understand that one twelfth of our currency is silver. We have more silver in circulation in the United States than any other country in the world, excepting China and India. More than half of the people in the world use silver money. These people have never used any other kind of money. To them silver is money—money that maintains its purchasing power within their country.

I could go on for some length, Senator, discussing matters upon which you speak with greater authority than myself. I could touch on the foreign-trade angle of the silver question and our trade with silver countries. But you are more familiar with these matters than I am. My purpose in writing is to inform you that I am about to attempt to do something tangible about this silver question. It is my belief that one of the great obstacles to the remonetization of silver is this illogical fear of the average person raised by a misconception of the matter.

Therefore I am about to pay our not inconsiderable number of employees in the various factories, offices, and branch offices of the Burgess Battery Co. and affiliates, in silver coin to demonstrate to them and also to the Nation that the silver dollar, even now as always, is sound, spendable, and usuable money. This event will take place this forthcoming Saturday morning, the 20th, mainly at Freeport, Ill., but also at Madison, Wis., Moline, Ill., Chicago, and New York City.

I hope that this gesture on our part, demonstrating on an extremely practical basis that the silver dollar is a sound, spendable dollar, will lead many of our intelligent electorate to find out for themselves the true facts of the silver issue. I also believe that once the people of these United States examine for themselves the merits of the case for silver their judgment will lead them to support your good self and the other leaders in the fight for the remonetization of silver.

The business history of our companies is consistently conservative, and I mention this fact to support my contention that the remonetization of silver is essentially a conservative measure. I ask you to give as much cooperation as possible to our attempt to demolish the silver "straw man", since while the number of our employees is not small they are but a few of the many who should learn the facts in the case.

Respectfully,

C. F. BURGESS,
Chairman of the Board, Burgess Battery Co. and Affiliates.

I ask that certain data accompanying the letter may be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the data were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FREEPORT'S SILVER PAY ROLL

When: Saturday morning, January 20, beginning at about 8 o'clock, the silver-dollar pay roll will be distributed. The flow of this virtually earmarked currency can be traced through the trade channels of the community Saturday afternoon and for several days thereafter.

Where: The event is centered at the Burgess Battery Co. plant in Freeport, Ill. However, silver-dollar pay rolls will also be distributed in other Burgess plants and offices, located at Madison, Wis., Moline, Ill., Chicago, and New York, Saturday morning.

Why: It is the desire of Dr. C. F. Burgess, chairman of the board of the various Burgess industries, to make this experiment for a twofold purpose: First, Dr. Burgess believes this is the best way to demonstrate to a community that the silver dollar is a sound, spendable currency, and that the attention thus created will lead many of the intelligent citizens to find out for themselves the true facts of the silver issue now before Congress. Second, the study of the flow of money through the various channels of trade will indicate the purchasing power of an industrial pay roll in a typical community. Thus Burgess employees, for a single half month's pay, are placing $40,000 in circulation. This gives to Freeport an average silver currency of about $2 each per inhabitant.

The story: There are several unusual angles to this startling experiment. First, there is the pure mechanics of handling such a large amount of silver currency. Securing the necessary supply of silver dollars, shipping the supply to Freeport, the precautions taken to guard the fortune represented by that ton and a quarter or more of silver coin, the use of small canvas bags instead of usual pay envelopes, the paying of the employees, etc. Second, there is the flow of that avalanche of silver throughout the trade channels and banking circles of the community, a study of the movement of money being made possible by this virtually earmarked pay roll. Third, there are many human-interest stories available as to what workers do with their pay, how shopkeepers handle their receipts, especially when of this unusual nature, etc. Fourth, there are many merchandising angles available for specialized publications, such as trade journals, dealing with this novel experiment as a trade stimulator, applicable to other communities.

In addition to the Freeport event there is a possible Washington angle. Senator WHEELER and other advocates of silver money are already informed of this forthcoming event and have signified a keen interest. It is possible, and even probable, that some mention will be made of the Burgess silver-dollar pay roll in Congress during the silver discussions.

Personalities: The man behind this experiment is Dr. C. F. Burgess, an outstanding figure in the electrical and chemical fields, whose many practical contributions are in world-wide use today. Twenty-five years ago he organized the C. F. Burgess Laboratories after having served as a member of the faculty of the University of Wisconsin for many years. This organization, engaged in scientific research and engineering development, brought forth a perfected dry-battery cell, a substitute for the usual plaster walls, sound-measuring devices, accoustic-treatment materials, new metal alloys, stereotype mats, transparent wrapping materials, and other commercial products. The Burgess Battery Co., the Burgess Cellulose Co., the Burgess-Parr Co., and other subsidiaries are engaged in the producing and sale of developments that have come out of the C. F. Burgess Laboratories.

Facilities: Every news-gathering convenience is placed at your disposal. Any angle of the event can be made available to you. Interviews will be arranged so that you can obtain the particular phase of the experiment in which you are primarily interested. Any special data, statement, or even complete article will be prepared and submitted to you without cost; also photographs.

Be on hand Saturday morning at 8 o'clock in the Burgess Battery Co.'s office in Freeport, Ill., if you are covering the event at first hand. This early hour makes it necessary for you to be in Freeport Friday night, January 19, so as to be on the scene the first thing Saturday morning.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, at this time I also desire to have inserted in the RECORD, as part of my remarks, a statement published in the press on Saturday, January 20, with reference to exactly what took place at Freeport, Ill. It reads, in part:

Nearly a ton and a half of silver fell like an avalanche on Freeport this afternoon when the 500 employees and executives of the Burgess Industries began spending in the local stores and markets the silver dollars with which they had been paid out of a total silver pay roll of $40,000 earlier in the day.

Likewise I desire to call attention to a telegram which I received from this same company. The telegram reads as follows:

FREEPORT, ILL., January 21, 1934.

Senator BURTON K. WHEELER,
Washington, D.C.:

Harking back to days when all pay rolls were in gold and silver, this community yesterday returned to silver standard when 500 Burgess Industries employees were paid off with $40,000. Dr. C. F.

Burgess, whose hobby has long been uses and applications of silver, originated experiment intended to show community that silver dollar is sound, spendable currency, and hopes that attention thus created will lead many intelligent citizens to find out true facts of silver for themselves first. Experiment has been very successful with merchants and stores cooperating and community very much interested.

BURGESS BATTERY CO.

Mr. President, many of us in the Senate who have been interested in this subject have been extremely apprehensive lest nothing would be done toward the remonetization of silver, particularly since the so-called "gold bill" has been introduced, but I want to give notice now that I, for one, intend to offer an amendment to the gold bill, so called, for the purpose of rehabilitating silver. I am convinced, in my own mind, after giving considerable thought to the subject, that cutting the gold content of the dollar will not raise commodity prices in this country to any appreciable extent unless such action shall be followed by an increase in the currency of the country. My information is to the effect that the bankers in New York, and likewise the British Government, have stated that they do not want any silver legislation.

I have heard statements or rumors to the effect that the bankers in New York had served notice and threatened the administration that if any silver legislation were enacted they would not buy the Treasury's bonds. I, of course, do not know how true it is, and I cannot conceive that this administration would be for a moment influenced in that way, but I do say that it is about time that the Congress of the United States, where we all know the sentiment is overwhelmingly for the rehabilitation and remonetization of silver, itself acted in this matter.

Indeed, I hope that we shall be able to unite upon an amendment to the so-called "gold bill" adding silver as a primary money to our present monetary system. If we do not do that, then, I think the Congress of the United States will be derelict in its duty. I think, Mr. President, likewise, that unless we do remonetize silver, in addition to what has already been done, the efforts that have thus far been put forth by the President of the United States will prove futile because of the fact that every thinking man, in my judgment, who has given serious thought to this subject realizes that we must broaden the monetary base before we can have any real prosperity.

I am not going to take further time of the Senate this afternoon. I conclude by repeating that I expect at the proper time to offer to the gold bill such an amendment as I have indicated, and I shall then address the Senate further upon the subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. OVERTON in the chair). Does the Senator from Montana desire incorporated in the RECORD the article to which he referred?

Mr. WHEELER. Yes; I do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The article is as follows:

FREEPORT, ILL., January 20.—Nearly a ton and a half of silver fell like an avalanche on Freeport this afternoon when the 500 employees and executives of the Burgess industries began spending in the local stores and markets the silver dollars with which they had been paid out of a total silver pay roll of $40,000 earlier in the day.

Brought into Freeport under heavy guard from Chicago 2 days previously with the maximum of secrecy, the large pay roll for the Burgess companies had been prepared by Walter C. Pfender, cashier of the State Bank of Freeport, with the assistance of D. J. Teare, treasurer for the Burgess Battery Co., on Friday.

Before daybreak this morning a truck backed up to the bank's portals and the money was transferred to it in hundreds of small canvas bags packed in wooden boxes. Under the supervision of D. W. Hirtle, general manager of the Burgess Battery Co., the load was brought to the plant at Stephenson Avenue with the police escort in charge of Chief of Police A. H. Wilke and Officers Z. C. Gavenner, Edgar Brown, and Walter March.

At 7:30 a.m., under the watchful eyes of armed guards and the police, equipped with machine guns, sawed-off shotguns, tear bombs, and drawn revolvers, the paying off of the 500 employees started. Instead of the customary yellow envelop containing the usual paper dollars, each employee was handed a white canvas bag striped with black and sealed at the top. Each bag weighed about 5 pounds and contained 2 weeks' pay entirely made up of silver dollars. Enclosed was a notice from the company which read:

"Burgess pay rolls are being met this one time only in silver dollars. The reasons for this procedure are two:

"(1) To promote the popularizing of silver currency and to cooperate with the administration in its silver policies.

"(2) To demonstrate the importance of our industries to the city of Freeport.

"Freeport merchants are cooperating in this program; we urge you to spend these silver dollars in the payment of your bills and in the purchase of the usual values being offered today."

The uses and application of silver have long constituted a hobby of Dr. C. F. Burgess, chairman of the board of the various Burgess industries. The distribution of silver dollars for the entire pay roll of such a group of industries has served a twofold purpose: First, it is Dr. Burgess' idea that this is the best way to prove to the community that the silver dollar is a sound, spendable currency; and that the attention thus created will lead many of the intelligent citizens to find out for themselves the true facts of the silver issue now before Congress; second, the study of the flow of such veritably ear-marked money through the various channels of trade will show the purchasing power of an industrial pay roll in a typical community. Thus Burgess' employees for a single half month's pay are placing $40,000 in circulation. This gives Freeport an average silver currency of about $2 per each inhabitant.

As shipments by express had been made earlier to district offices and plants in Madison, Wis., Moline, Ill., Chicago, and New York, the entire pay roll was paid off completely by 12 o'clock noon. Two hundred and odd pounds of silver, representing the electric power bill for the previous month, was transported under armed guard down Main Street to the office of the Illinois Northern Utility Co. Two wheelbarrows were needed for this silver load which was received by George R. Fluehr, general manager of the power company, who duly receipted for the bill.

Throughout the town merchants and storekeepers were soon cashing in the thousands of silver pieces which had been loosed by the Burgess employees. The first silver dollar to be spent belonged to Jeff Dietrich, tinsmith in the Burgess battery plant's maintenance department. He bought a pack of cigarettes from a store on the corner of East Stephenson Street near the plant. The next dollar went to buy a gasoline filling for the car of Vic Fishburn, an official of the Burgess cellulose organization, from a filling station across the bridge owned by Mutt Foley. This reporter was unable to follow the spending of the third, fourth, fifth, and other dollars, for their going was too fast and in too many directions. It was noticed that in the case of Belva Molter, switchboard operator, at least five of the silver dollars were at once deposited in the silk-stocking bank, where they made a not inconsiderable bulge.

Several of the town's wide-awake merchants, alert to the opportunity this silver manna afforded, soon arranged special sales in which silver dollars played an important part. For the word that there was silver—real silver—spread through the Main Street and Stephenson Street sections like wildfire.

Silver dollars gravitated toward Stukenberg's Department Store, one of the first to display the "Silver Dollar Special" signs. The Freeport Hardware Store, the Kresge Store, and the Emmert Drug Store, as well as the Hermsmeyer Grocery Store, to mention but a few, received a large influx of the metal currency from eager, smiling, embarrassed, or anxious customers.

There were many amusing incidents. Hermsmeyer's soon had no place left in his several cash registers for the cash intake, and Ben had to send to his stockroom for several stout boxes in which to toss the silver coins. Another shopkeeper had to send out for several flour sacks in which to pile the silver dollars. Still another asked every silver-dollar possessor for the black-striped bag, gathering a sufficient number for the transfer of the coins back to the bank with his deposit slip.

By midafternoon practically every one of the several hundred stores and shops had taken in at least a half dozen silver dollars. By early evening some of the dollars had traveled as far as Dixon, Stockton, Orangeville, Lena, Monroe, Elizabeth, Byron, Oneco, Davis, and Polo, as well as other outlying towns and districts.

A silver dollar is a rare thing these days. It is something to look at. The $40,000 shipment of silver dollars to the Burgess industries came from the Chicago Federal Reserve Bank. It took about a week for the several banks to collect the amount. The money was sent to Freeport by express. The total weight of the shipment was almost 2,600 pounds. There was enough silver in it to make a wire that would stretch around the earth, at the equator, 32 times. Or, were it pounded into a sheet there would be enough silver to cover the pavement of a street 30 feet wide and 19 miles long. Again, if the Burgess silver dollars were placed edge to edge, they would reach a distance three and a half times greater than the height of the Empire State Building. In fact, if the silver in these dollars were spun into a fine wire, it would stretch from the Burgess plant at Freeport, Ill., to the White House in Washington 1,017 times.

WAR AND PEACE

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point an editorial appearing in the Irish World for January 6, 1934, entitled "Murder Most Foul", and I desire to submit a few remarks in relation to it.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

[From the Irish World, Jan. 6, 1934]

MURDER MOST FOUL

A brief dispatch from Europe last week throws a lurid light on the plans of some of the leading powers of that distracted continent. It said, in so many words, that various governments are offering bonuses and other rewards to parents of large families in order that there may be a sufficient supply of cannon fodder for the next world war.

It seems incredible that human, and presumably Christian, governments could so callously plan murder on a wholesale scale 18 or 20 years from now. Yet such seems to be the fact.

Just as the coming into the world of children is looked upon as the greatest blessing, so is their death, and particularly their brutal murder, considered the greatest disaster.

What, then, are we to think of politicians, diplomats, and financiers who, even today, are urging parents to rear large families in order that the young men of the next generation may find death in all of the intensified and horrible forms which the modern science of murder is busily inventing?

It has been said by the cynic that the man who steals a dollar is a thief, whereas he who steals a million is a financier.

In the same way cannot it be said that the gunman who kills a fellow human being is a murderer, while he who engineers the killing of thousands is a monster?

Those who plan murder are equally guilty with those who do the actual slaying. In the case of war the guilt is entirely on the heads of those who do the planning.

We are told, by no less an authority than H. G. Wells, that the war which began in 1914 was the "war to end war." That statement was utterly false, and its author knew it to be false. Today we find the wholesale murderers of Europe planning for a war in the near future and for still another war some 20 years from now.

The only fortunate circumstance about this plot is that it has been exposed. It is well that the fathers and mothers of today know what is being planned for their sons in the future.

Human beings, as has so often been shown, are sheeplike when driven. History, however, also shows that it is possible to drive them too far.

If the parents of today will instil certain basic principles into their growing children, there is reason to hope that the young men of 1954 will refuse to carry out that part of the program now assigned to them by those so carefully planning their execution.

War is justifiable only as a last resource, when all other efforts to defend our country, our lives, and our homes have failed; in other words, when an enemy has actually embarked on an expedition having for its purpose the invasion of our shores. There are, of course, also cases where national honor is involved, but there are many better ways of settling such accounts than by a declaration of war.

To prevent others from making unprovoked war upon us, it is our duty to be at all time so well prepared as to make an attack too expensive to contemplate. Such is the sensible and human attitude which the people of this Republic, and the peoples of all other lands, should have toward war.

If the ruling powers of Europe agreed to confine a declaration of war to the causes outlined above, there would be no need now to urge parents to rear families for murder later.

It is the Christian concept that children are brought into the world for the purpose of carrying on the work of the world, of leading decent and useful lives, not only for their own benefit but for that of their neighbors. It is exceedingly questionable if devilish ingenuity has ever conceived a more horrible or repulsive plan than the bringing of children into the world in order to consign them to destruction.

Parents should, from now on, make it their business to educate their children in these facts, to impress upon them that most wars are made by so-called "diplomats" hungry for power and by financiers hungry for more gold, aided by the manufacturers of munitions, hungry for profits. Let them impress upon their children the ghastly immortality of most of the wars of the past several centuries, wars in which the younger men were made involuntary sacrifices upon the altar of lust and empire.

Nor do we need wait until 20 years have passed, for these dealers in wholesale murder are ready for the slaughter to begin now. If the opportunity arrives, they will stage their carnival of blood this year! Now is the time to educate those who are destined to be the victims; now is the time to expose fully this hellish plot and scotch it before it has a chance to mature.

There are three ways in which Americans can aid in this: By insisting upon the payments of the debts incurred during the last war, by making it plain that this country will never again become involved in the war-madness of Europe, and by making the United States of America impregnable.

In doing these things we will be serving humanity now and later.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, the cold and brutal calculation with which modern wars are conceived is almost unbelievable. It is difficult to believe that it was only 15 years ago when this country entered the great struggle to make war forever impossible. Today threats and rumors of war are seen and heard on every hand. The high idealism of a score of years ago seems utterly forgotten and the nations of the world seem to be cautiously edging toward another bloody conflict. The article in the Irish World calls attention to the attempt of the governments of Europe to increase their populations so as to better compete with one another when the battle flags are unfurled. If those who plan wars devote their keenest thought to that bloody end, we who desire peace should be equally keen and alert to protect our people from destruction.

In time of war there is not only loss of men and money but loss of morality and true religion. The war god is no friend of the great Prince of Peace. I shall never forget the horrible sights of war which I witnessed in Europe during the late world-wide conflict. Among all the shocking sights and experiences was one which was most degrading. There were the representatives of the Christian church, divided into hostile camps, and yet praying to the same God, taking on their lips the name of the same Christ, asking that victory crown their arms and that death and defeat should overwhelm the enemy. Thus the great World War prostituted the Christian religion.

While the warring nations of the world nurse their bitter hatreds and prepare to take the field, the United States should follow the leadership of George Washington and do all in her power to maintain our position of neutrality and peace. We have no part in European hatreds or Asiatic conflicts. We have nothing to gain by war and everything to lose. The lessons of the last war should not be forgotten. We sent our men and money to Europe with the utmost generosity. By forgetting the part which has been assigned by our geographic position and the barriers of two great oceans, we plunged ourselves into the maelstrom of war and have reaped for ourselves the burden of excessive taxation through uncanceled war debts. The nations which owe us and have defaulted in their payments do not view us with friendly eyes. An unwilling debtor has but little affection for his creditor.

While these debts remain unpaid and uncanceled, we may be sure that this mountain of debt will stand as a monument of peace. This mountain of debt will convince all thinking people that civilized nations cannot endure the crushing burden of war and that they are not justified in fighting new wars when they cannot pay for the old ones. We do not anticipate that the United States will lend foreign powers money with which to fight or prepare to fight new wars. Also we do not anticipate that the civilian populations of foreign powers will look with commendation on their governments as they seek to finance new wars through forced loans and high taxation drawn from impoverished peoples. If the debts to the United States remain uncanceled, the mountain of debt will stand as a monument to peace.

The American people as a whole have nothing to gain through foreign wars. Our problem is to maintain our traditional neutrality and our peace with the world. In these days when there is every evidence that the nations of the world are refusing to follow the lead which we have set toward disarmament, and when they are definitely building their navies to treaty strength, we are compelled to maintain our national defense. This does not mean that we propose to become a militant nation. It does mean that in the interest of world peace we stand ready to defend our national rights. While we deplore the fact that the nations of the world have chosen the way of war rather than the way of peace, we must not become the prey of the pirates of the world by a failure to provide national defense through our Navy, Army, and air forces.

Pat Frank, in the Washington Herald, calls attention to the sole surviving copy of the Code Duello in the Library of Congress. Article 10 of this code for fighting duels declares that—

No apology can be received for a blow.

This little sentence caused countless duels. It has now become obsolete. Dueling has been banished. We now regard it as an antiquated method of settling personal differences. Just as we are now lifted above dueling, the day will come when, despite the desire of war profiteers in business and government, war will not only stand outlawed as at present but will be regarded as wholly impracticable.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD following my remarks the Duel Code of Honor or the 39 articles which constitute the basis of an article appearing in this morning's Washington Herald by Mr. Frank.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE CODE OF HONOR, OR THE 39 ARTICLES

ARTICLE THE FIRST

Affairs of honor must be conducted coolly, courteously, and steadily, as a contrary course serves but to aggravate difficulties and lead to results harsh, passionate, and discreditable to gentlemen of true and deliberate courage. Remember that deliberate conduct only can reap whatever eclat is derivable from the duel, and that a cool head produces a steady hand.

ARTICLE THE SECOND

Apologies and explanations must be promptly required and fully and satisfactorily rendered. A badly or semirendered apology is an unmanly proceeding, and if admitted, is more dangerous than none, as it implies on the part of the acceptor timidity of character under a guise of courage.

Very amusing is it to witness the shelter taken by some gentlemen nowadays under what is termed "the privilege of debate", to launch forth into insulting, personal invective and afterward, when pressed to give satisfaction by apology or otherwise, the ingenious industry they exhibit to give a Pickwickian construction to the same. Equally amusing is it indeed, also, to read much of the correspondence which passes on such occasions, where the original offensiveness of a phrase or epithet actually exhales under a load of verbiage and the perplexities of language in the context, whereby the offended party and the community generally are mystified into an impression that "the affair has been very honorably and very satisfactorily adjusted!"

ARTICLE THE THIRD

No gentleman on reflecting on the injury he may have done to the feelings of another gentleman, by a hasty expression will hesitate to apologize promptly for the same.

Hasty expressions should be eschewed by all gentlemen, if possible. As the offensive vocabulary, indeed, abounds with epithets temptingly expressive, a gentleman should be very cautious how he yields to the seduction, lest, by any profusion of apple-woman rhetoric, he render himself unworthy of notice.

ARTICLE THE FOURTH

Oral apologies may be received for oral offenses; but the atonement must be as ample and as public as the offense, and, if practicable, rendered before all the parties witnessing the offense. To this, no gentleman will object, as a brave man, on discovering himself to be in error, will ever be as prompt to redress as to resent an injury.

Should the apology be rendered voluntarily, and as soon after the offense is given, as is consistent with a proper time for reflection on the part of the person offending, it will look more graceful, and will be more satisfactory to all the parties.

ARTICLE THE FIFTH

A gentleman must yield nothing to the tone of a demand for an apology, particularly if the tone or manner of such demand be menacing. Remember to spurn every appeal which is made to your fears.

ARTICLE THE SIXTH

Should a gentleman apply to another a harsh epithet, knowing such epithet to be applicable, he must not retract, but must admit an appeal to the duel, if his opponent take rank as a gentleman. Such retraction would involve a deliberate falsehood.

ARTICLE THE SEVENTH

Should a gentleman apply to another the epithet "coward", suspecting him to be such, he may not retract on demand, but may readily do so after being called to the field and receiving the first fire of his opponent. Prior to such retraction, however, there must be a suspension of the challenge required and obtained by the second of the challenged party.

ARTICLE THE EIGHTH

A gentleman challenging another for the "coward", should no retraction be made after the first shot, must continue to fire until one of the parties is hit. Otherwise, the affair will remain in statu quo, and no satisfaction be obtained.

ARTICLE THE NINTH

Should both parties be gentlemen recognizing the propriety of the duel, they may not have recourse to fisticuffs or cudgels, which, though an obvious and natural mode of determining difficulties, is one properly at a discount among men of honor.

An exception, however, may sometimes be made in favor of a gentleman who, from the known superior skill of his antagonist in the use of the duelling weapon, will endeavor, should matters proceed to extremities, to equalize the chances, first, by giving the blow, and consequently, by becoming the challenged party, when he can have a choice of weapons, distance, etc. The blow, however, should be a single one, and with the open hand.

ARTICLE THE TENTH

No apology can be received for a blow.[1]

ARTICLE THE ELEVENTH

Should a blow be inflicted by mistake, an apology will be admissible. The aggressor, however, on discovering his mistake, and after expressing his regret, must offer himself to be struck in the same manner, with the same weapon, and before the parties witnessing the blow, of which proposal, the party aggressed can avail himself or not, as he pleases.

ARTICLE THE TWELFTH

An apology may be received for a blow if the party inflicting it has been violently pushed, jostled, or trodden on, seemingly with the intention of offense, the person struck, however, acknowledging beforehand that such pushing, jostling, or treading on was altogether involuntary.

Illustrative of this article is an affair which occurred a few years ago between two gentlemen whom, for propriety's sake, we shall designate by the titles of A and B respectively. These gentlemen, a feeling of hostility existing between them at the time, happened to find themselves in rather close proximity to each other on a certain evening as they were riding into the city of Washington. A, desirous of riding ahead, spurred his horse, but the animal, being somewhat ungovernable, endeavored to bolt, whereby his rider was borne with some violence against B, considerably jarring the latter. B, deeming the violence intentional, rode after A and struck him. A challenge from the latter was the consequence; but this, after some correspondence on the subject, was suspended, the suspension being accompanied by the declaration that the jostling was involuntary, when an apology from B was admitted for the blow. It will be proper, however, to act very cautiously on such precedents.

ARTICLE THE THIRTEENTH

Should the gentleman receiving the blow derive severe bodily injury from the same, he will lie under no obligation of appealing to the duel but may seek redress at common law. Nothing save an outrage of the most atrocious character can warrant a violent blow, or a repetition of the blow.

Generally speaking, indeed, if a gentleman, with a view to resenting an affront or provoking a challenge, inflict a blow, let it be given with the open hand, or, if armed, with a whip or cane, let the blow fall across the shoulders, but he must not repeat it unless a return blow from the antagonist party should require it. The ignominy of a slight blow is sufficient to answer every purpose intended by it among gentlemen; and the fact of severely beating another gentleman when a more honorable mode of redress is open, is too nearly akin to ruffianism to exempt the perpetrator from loss of caste.

ARTICLE THE FOURTEENTH

A gentleman receiving a blow must not expect the subsequent advantage of becoming the challenged party by sending insulting notes, or using provoking language, but must appeal to the duel at once.

An amusing incident occurred some years ago in North Carolina. During a nocturnal symposium, Mr. Cake hurled a glass tumbler at the head of Mr. Smith, which missing the target intended, was shivered on the opposite wall. Whereupon Mr. Smith slapped Mr. Cake rather emphatically on the chaps, remarking at the same time very significantly, that he would expect to have the pleasure of hearing from him (the aforesaid Mr. Cake) on the following morning. Accordingly, Mr. Cake found himself on the following morning in what logicians call a "dilemma." Much of his pugnacity had evaporated during sleep. He knew Mr. Smith to be a resolute man; had heard, moreover, that he was a tolerable "shot", and fancying that he (Mr. Cake) could he but manage it, might derive great advantage from being the challenged, instead of the challenging party—still greater advantage, probably, could he, by some coup de désespoir, get out of the scrape altogether, after the lapse of a week, he electrified Mr. Smith by sending him the following extraordinary note:

"MR. JOHN SMITH:

"SIR: After your rude, barbarous, and truculent treatment of me some nights ago, I can no longer consider you worthy the vengeance of a gentleman and a man of honor.

"I am, sir,

"WASHINGTON CAKE."

Mr. Smith, after laughing over this precious missive with his friends, committed it to the flames.

ARTICLE THE FIFTEENTH

For being intentionally spit on; for having wine, snuff, etc., thrown in the face, no apology is admissible, but redress must be sought by the duel, if the party aggressing rank as a gentleman.

---

[1] The following rule was instituted, many years ago in County Galway, Ireland, a country where the point of honor is well understood, by a council of the Burkes and Blakes and Bodkins, very notable fire-dragons, but imbued with something like a generous regard for human life, viz: "That satisfaction can be rendered for a blow with a whip, cane, or the open hand, by the person's submitting himself to the party aggressed, to be struck in the same manner, with the same weapon, and in presence of those who were witnesses of the first assault." See Memoirs of Sir Jonah Barrington.

ARTICLE THE SIXTEENTH

Should a gentleman strike another for a verbal offense, he can afterward require no apology for such offense. But should the blow be returned, and he be injured or overpowered in the contest, an appeal will lie to the duel.

ARTICLE THE SEVENTEENTH

For a direct insult to a lady, no apology can be received. But as this code is intended for the use of gentlemen, and as no individual of that caste is capable of insulting a lady, the despicable hounds so transgressing are hereby surrendered to the ear-slitting clemency of the lady's friends.

ARTICLE THE EIGHTEENTH

No gentleman may notice the insulting language of an inferior.

ARTICLE THE NINETEENTH

A gentleman cannot be degraded by a blow from an inferior, but redress will be permissible to him either by means of the horsewhip or at common law.

ARTICLE THE TWENTIETH

No apology can be made or received after the parties have gone to the field and taken their ground until after the first fire. A contrary course would involve a suspicion of cowardice on the part of the person apologizing.

ARTICLE THE TWENTY-FIRST

No apology can be made while a challenge is present; a previous withdrawal of the challenge being necessary for that purpose, otherwise the apology would seem to have been extorted by fear.

ARTICLE THE TWENTY-SECOND

No officer may challenge his prisoner, while such; as such conduct would be ungenerous and incompatible with that perfect equality and freedom of action so necessary for the challenged party to enjoy.

ARTICLE THE TWENTY-THIRD

A gentleman cannot receive a challenge from another if the latter has not had an honorable acquittal in some previous affair of a similar nature. For instance: A cannot receive a challenge from B if it is believed that the latter has not acquitted himself honorably in an affair with C; but a certificate of honorable acquittal from C will entitle B to the attention of A.

ARTICLE THE TWENTY-FOURTH

A gentleman may not accept a challenge from a person who, however high he may rank as a gentleman in the opinion of the rest of society, is known to the aforesaid gentleman to have committed some breach of honor and of gentlemanly propriety. For instance: John Smith, sensible from secret but unquestionable information, that Thomas Surface is not a gentleman, although he pass for such with the rest of the community, may not accept a challenge from said Thomas Surface; but, after having made public his reasons for such refusal, he may offer to accept a challenge from any gentleman who will think proper to consider these reasons insufficient.

ARTICLE THE TWENTY-FIFTH

Other persons than those intended to act as seconds in the duel, may be the bearers of the preliminary correspondence. It will be proper, however, that the principals signify so much to each other in the initiative.

ARTICLE THE TWENTY-SIXTH

The bearer of a missive is not to be considered cognizant of, nor responsible for, its contents, if the missive be sealed.

ARTICLE THE TWENTY-SEVENTH

If A be the bearer of a cartel from B, with whom he is only partially acquainted, to C who has had better opportunities of knowing B, he may not, if courteously received by C, consider as personally offensive to himself, C's objection to recognizing B as a gentleman.

From a Code of Honor, drawn up by a Mr. Arthur Hamilton, of Dublin, in 1807, I think (for I have not the work before me), and sanctioned by a certificate of approval incorporated with the book, by the commander in chief of H.B.M.'s forces in Ireland, himself a patron of the duel, I append the following rule for the benefit of the reader. It is a most excellent rule, and is the same in substance as article 27. "The bearer of a challenge must not, in any case, consider as personally offensive to himself, the fact that the challenged party declines recognizing the challenger as a gentleman, provided he himself, the bearer of the challenge, be received courteously and with respect, because," reasons Mr. Hamilton, "a man's character is based upon, and is matter of opinion, in relation to which, any two sensible persons are at liberty to differ." I have given the substance of the rule, if not the words.

ARTICLE THE TWENTY-EIGHTH

A gentleman may decline to meet, on the same quarrel, the second of his adversary, when the latter has been prevented by some casualty from fulfilling his engagement; but he may meet that second on some new ground of quarrel between themselves.

ARTICLE THE TWENTY-NINTH

A gentleman must detail to his second the nature, origin, and all the particulars of his quarrel previously to any action on the quarrel.

ARTICLE THE THIRTIETH

If a gentleman and his second concur not in their views of prosecuting an affair, the second will be at liberty to withdraw from the whole matter.

ARTICLE THE THIRTY-FIRST

If a gentleman should refuse to be directed by his second, even after they have come to the ground, the second will be at liberty to withdraw; but the principal so deserted must have time to procure another friend.

Some principals have submitted themselves to the directions of an individual or common friend of both parties. But such a proceeding is very irregular, and should be resorted to only in extremities. In case of accident, two witnesses will be necessary to acquit the survivor of the charge of foul play or intentional murder; and should both principals fall, the individual witness, if arraigned, will be put to trouble.

It often occurred, indeed, in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, and even later, that principals went out to single combat without witnesses, and the laws recognized the guiltlessness of the survivor. The enactments of existing society would, in all probability punish the survivor as an assassin.

ARTICLE THE THIRTY-SECOND

Should a gentleman, for receiving verbal offense, have honorable satisfaction denied him, he will publish his adversary in appropriate terms with whatever correspondence may have passed between them on the subject of their quarrel.

In some parts of England and Ireland, it was, and still is, customary, I believe, to inflict, publicly, a single blow with a horsewhip on the shoulders of the recusant party. This custom is certainly more creditable than that pursued in many parts of our own country, where street fights, knife hacking, and dirk exercise are considered necessary consequences of every negative to meet in combat.

Except only where satisfaction is refused for a blow, it will be necessary merely to publish the person, or the correspondence, if such have taken place, with appropriate comments. This exposure will be sufficiently effective to degrade the one and redress the other.

ARTICLE THE THIRTY-THIRD

Should a gentleman for receiving a blow, be denied honorable satisfaction, he will publicy inflict on the recusant party, at least one blow with a horsewhip, and afterward, post him as a coward. Should the person so posted, afterward challenge the poster, the challenge must go for nothing.

ARTICLE THE THIRTY-FOURTH

Should a gentleman receive offense from another with whose address he is unacquainted, and, after a refusal of apology, be denied an interchange of cards, he must apply to him the open hand on the face, or a single blow of a cane on the shoulders.

As it is very improbable, however, that any gentleman will be so discourteous as to refuse his card or address on such an occasion, you had better reflect before proceeding to give the blow, whether your conduct should not be regulated by article 18.

ARTICLE THE THIRTY-FIFTH

Should any unfair advantage be attempted by the opposite party, such as responding in the negative a second time, to the question, "are you ready?" your second will be at liberty to withdraw you from the field. Such proceeding, as it is evidently intended to act on your nerve, is very foul and unmanly.

I take for granted, it will be perceived from this article, that the formula generally adopted at present, viz, "are you ready? Fire! one, two, three, stop!" will not be departed from. The seconds, however, will have plenary powers to adopt whatever formula and regulations they please. The possibility of such foul play occurring as it is mentioned above, has induced the author to make an article of it.

ARTICLE THE THIRTY-SIXTH

The principals must fire at, or within, the time prescribed by the second appointed to give the word.

ARTICLE THE THIRTY-SEVENTH

Should a gentleman with the apparent intention of hitting, fire before or after the time designated, so as to kill his antagonist, his life is forfeitable to the second of his antagonist; and should he only maim his opponent in any of his members, he forfeits a corresponding member in like manner.

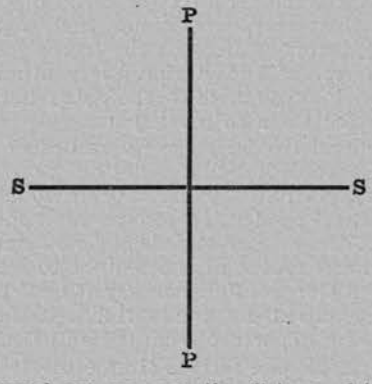
A hair-triggered weapon will sometimes explode in the hands of a nervous man without his volition; but want of intention will scarcely apply when the weapon explodes on the horizontal line. Should no damage be done by this irregular firing, the fire will count in the duel, while the principal will render himself liable to some unenviable criticism afterward.

ARTICLE THE THIRTY-EIGHTH

Should the firearm explode on the upward or downward perpendicular and before the word is given, the fire will not count in the duel, but the principal will be entitled to another cartridge.

ARTICLE THE THIRTY-NINTH

The second of the challenging party may withdraw his friend after the first fire except the nature of the quarrel be such as comes under the seventh and eighth articles.



APPENDIX

COMPRISING HINTS FOR GENTLEMEN

1. Be not prone to get into difficulties without a cause.

2. Correct, if possible, all morbidness in your temper; else you will be daily harassed by "airy nothings"—the butt of the designing and irresponsible buffoons, knaves, and tricksters of society, and hourly embroiled in petty hostilities.

3. Be your deportment uniformly steady, dignified, and respectful.
4. Remember that true courage is quiet and dignified, rather than brusque and blustering; and that the best metal is not that which rings the loudest.
5. A steady look and firm voice are good armor against impertinence.
6. Resist in a dignified but significant manner the first efforts of mortal man to acquire over you an arrogant ascendancy. Obsta principiis is a good motto, and "if you let the bit in your mouth, you must also let the saddle on your back", is a good Spanish proverb.
7. If naturally irritable, drink not stimulating drinks nor bet at cards.
8. As the gentleman's vocabulary is sufficiently copious to express resentment without introducing opprobrious epithets, "pray, you avoid them."
9. If indisposed to waive rank with a view to rendering satisfaction, never insult an officer who although beneath you in rank as an officer is yet your equal as a gentleman.
10. An officer who has been suspended or whose commission has been broken by a courtmartial for disobedience of orders, providing said disobedience does not involve an accusation of cowardice or gross immorality, will not lose caste as a gentleman, and his cartel will be entitled to attention.
11. As a gentleman, after retiring from your society for the night, and communing with himself, is apter, on reviewing your language and manner, to discover and take exception to things which he overlooked or noted not in your presence, and consequently to make them the basis of hostility toward you afterward, remember at all times to be guarded in your conduct and to keep yourself well upon your center.
12. As you may sometimes meet with a bully even among gentlemen—a rather anomalous thing—and have a difficulty with him, never yield to him in making conditions. If he offer to fight you at five paces, have the distance shortened, if possible, and insist on fighting him muzzle to muzzle.
13. Let the note which you send requiring an apology be couched in firm but gentlemanly language.
14. If a gentleman not intended to act as your second, in case your difficulties should result in a duel, be the bearer of a note demanding an apology, the note must be sealed.
15. Should a note be handed to you demanding an apology, remember to act deliberately; consult previously with a friend, if possible, and request the bearer of the note to call again at such time as you will be enabled to make a suitable reply.[1]
16. The friend whom you consult should have experience in such matters, if possible; and if you both do not differ materially in your consultation, you had better be guided by him.
17. Any correspondence and arrangements which subsequently take place must be conducted by your friend and that of your opponent.
18. It may sometimes happen that, from being among strangers, you will be obliged to correspond with an opponent's friend over your own signature. In that case, and your difficulty is necessarily about to merge in a duel, you will proceed directly to the nearest naval or military station, or, if there be none such within convenient reach, to the most select hotel or boarding house in your neighborhood, and make confidential inquiry of its conductor where a suitable person can be found for your purpose, taking care not to disclose to any other than the gentleman volunteering himself your second when and where the rendezvous is to take place, for fear of interruption.
19. You cannot be too particular, generally speaking, in the choice of a friend. Some, from want of sufficient firmness, may compromise your honor; others, from the false ambition—a fault of many young men—of having their names associated in any manner with dueling, may precipitate matters unnecessarily.
20. The positions of the parties on the field will be as in the diagram below, P denoting the position of the principals and S that of the seconds.

21. Either second can measure the distance determined on by the challenged party, the latter also having the choice of weapons.
22. Remember to receive your weapon from the hand of your own second only.

[1] Should you receive a peremptory challenge to fight, give the address of your friend at once.

23. Your second must be cautious not to place you facing the sun, or a strong wind, nor with any object, such as a cow, or horse, or house, or rock, or tree, ranging rearward of you within the distance of 200 yards.
24. Your second must permit no interference on the part of bystanders, except the manifestly irregular conduct of your antagonist's second, make it necessary that he (your second) should confer with some one of said bystanders competent to give advice.
25. After taking your place, you will salute your antagonist with a distant but not discourteous inclination of the head.
26. Your second must see that your antagonist deliver his fire within the time, and be ready to support you should you stagger from the effect of your antagonist's ball.
27. Avoid all harsh language toward your opponent on the ground. Gasconading before or after you deliver your fire is highly contemptible.
28. After the duel, apply no recriminating or disparaging language toward your late antagonist. If you cannot speak respectfully of him, speak not of him at all. You called him out to render you satisfaction, and after granting you the rendezvous, if you did not hit him, it was not his fault.
29. After the duel listen but little to the impertinences of that tribe of diminutive heroes who traffic in apocryphal gossipry; who wink and nod and snigger and shake the head in ominous and terrible meaning of what they would have done, etc., and who, altogether, comment with most voluble balderdash on every duel that occurs, or has been likely to occur. The totality of such things had as lief achieve a summersault into Avernus, as look into the muzzle of a dueling pistol.
30. Never give an opinion, if possible, to the disparagement of parties who have decided their differences out of rule, provided the manner of their combat has not been barbarous, for courage is respectable almost under every appearance when exercised for the protection of honor and in behalf of acknowledged rights.

OPERATION OF THE N.R.A.

Mr. NYE obtained the floor.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me in order that I may suggest the absence of a quorum?

Mr. NYE. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. HATFIELD. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Couzens	Kean	Robinson, Ark.
Ashurst	Cutting	Keyes	Russell
Austin	Davis	King	Schall
Bachman	Dickinson	La Follette	Sheppard
Bailey	Dieterich	Lewis	Shipstead
Bankhead	Dill	Logan	Smith
Barbour	Duffy	Lonergan	Steiwer
Barkley	Erickson	McAdoo	Stephens
Black	Fess	McCarran	Thomas, Okla.
Bone	Fletcher	McGill	Thomas, Utah
Borah	Frazier	McKellar	Thompson
Brown	George	McNary	Townsend
Bulkley	Gibson	Murphy	Trammell
Bulow	Glass	Neely	Tydings
Byrnes	Goldsborough	Norris	Vandenberg
Capper	Gore	Nye	Van Nuys
Caraway	Hale	O'Mahoney	Wagner
Carey	Harrison	Overton	Walcott
Clark	Hastings	Patterson	Walsh
Connally	Hatch	Pittman	Wheeler
Coolidge	Hatfield	Pope	White
Copeland	Hayden	Reynolds
Costigan	Johnson	Robinson, Ind.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] is necessarily detained.

Mr. FESS. I desire to announce that the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED], the Senators from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF and Mr. HEBERT], and the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK] are necessarily absent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Ninety Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, on last Thursday, in a full spirit of helpfulness, cooperative desire, and friendliness, I undertook here to voice some of the complaints which have been made by smaller units of business throughout the country respecting the hardship that was being visited upon them by reason of the N.R.A. codes under which they were being asked to operate.

On the evening of that day the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], who had also spoken on the subject, and myself were very severely taken to task in an address delivered by Gen. Hugh S. Johnson, the Administrator of N.R.A., in New York. In this New York address we, who had hoped that we were helping and were cooperating, were charged in quite direct manner with being dead cats, chiselers, and whatnot.

I find it necessary at this time, no matter how distasteful it may be to the ear of the Administrator of N.R.A., again to beat the tom-toms, as he likes to refer to it, regarding some of these N.R.A. codes.

It was clear from the general's address in New York that far in advance of his engagement there he had undertaken to anticipate what was going to be said here on the floor of the Senate in criticism of certain phases of his administration of N.R.A. It is clear from a reading of his address that he came far, far from hitting the mark or guessing at what was going to be said. My colleagues will recollect that the general's name was not mentioned once during my discourse; that there was no reference by anyone on the floor that was discourteous or to the discredit of General Johnson; yet he made there his speech, and I think in all fairness to him and to the Senate that his remarks as released to the press ought to be printed in the RECORD.

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, that this address by Gen. Hugh S. Johnson, Administrator of the N.R.A., may be printed in the RECORD following my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit A.)

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, in the light of the spirit of the criticism that was offered here on the floor on last Thursday, it was difficult, needless to say, to understand General Johnson's attitude. It was not in any sense an answer to what had been charged here on the floor during that afternoon; and when I read his speech I was somehow taken back to the volume entitled "The New Freedom", written by Woodrow Wilson, for reference to a little story that I thought he had there told of an engagement in which he had once participated, involving a debate. The henchmen of his opponent had gathered together in the hall where the debate was to be held and were ready, if need be, to make trouble in defense and in support of their friend who was debating with Mr. Wilson that night. The debate had not progressed very far before the friends of the one observed that Mr. Wilson was putting it all over his opponent; whereupon these gangsters in the gallery got their heads together, agreed upon a course, and finally sent up the shout for their champion down on the platform to call him a liar and make it a fight.

Quite often men who are hard pressed for an adequate answer to any charge or suggestion do like to make it a fight. However, in the general's speech in New York there was really but one serious charge. That charge was to the effect that certain Senators who are now critics would not play ball with General Johnson's administration of N.R.A. The charge was made that some few of us were inclined to like to criticize, but, instead of getting down in the arena and fighting where fight was needed, we sat along the side lines and beat the tom-toms.

I think perhaps it would be well to quote some of the language resorted to by General Johnson in that connection. I find him saying early in his address:

> I asked the very gentlemen who are now concerning themselves with this kind of problem to sit in here and try to see that only good results. They did not accept. I conjecture that they did not want to because a contrary course is the reason for their being. I believe that they preferred to sit aside and conjecture evil. So long as they both shall live they will have to answer as to why they did not consent. That circumstance discounted 50 percent of what they now say. They could have cooperated. They elected otherwise.

Mr. President, it is not my desire to reveal any of the intimate details concerning the contacts which I have had with General Johnson, very friendly contacts, during the last 2 months, but his charge necessitates such explanation as I am sure the story which I am about to tell will make available.

Sometime during December I went personally directly to General Johnson concerning the hardships which the so-called "National Electric Manufacturers Association" code was imposing upon certain independent small business houses in the country. I received at General Johnson's hands very serious consideration. I thought, and still believe, that he was then appreciative of the spirit in which such criticism as I was offering was presented. In any event, here was a case of small independents who were being virtually put out of business by reason of codes which had been drafted by the monopolistic end of the electrical manufacturing business, and not only that, but codes being administered by the monopolists within the industry. The independents were seeking to accomplish consideration by N.R.A. of a supplemental code having to do with that particular industry. General Johnson at the time gave every assurance that there would be reconsideration, that they were going to do the right thing with respect to that particular code.

In connection with the criticism concerning the great amount of complaint that was reaching me regarding the difficulties which independents were having in all lines, I indicated to General Johnson a grave need for the creation of some body within the N.R.A. that would afford an outlet for these independents, some such set-up as would give these independents a chance to be heard, to have their difficulties studied, and, if these studies revealed grave injustices under the code, then there should follow recommendations for changes in the code.

General Johnson and Mr. Richberg at the time took very kindly to my suggestion that a board be created, to be made up of men who are outstanding defenders of small business, men in whom small business would have the utmost confidence, men who could be approached by these independents with an assurance that they were going to have a friendly hearing, and such friendly action as that hearing would warrant.

It was 10 days later when General Johnson called me to advise me that he had laid my suggestion before the President, and that the President had just advised him that afternoon of his hearty concurrence in the suggestion I had made. He advised me that he was prepared to appoint such a board, and asked me if I would serve upon it. He indicated at the time that he was making a like request upon our very able colleague, the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH].

I begged for opportunity to consider the matter. I advised General Johnson that, approaching as we were a new session of the Congress, I could not very well see how I could take on an additional burden as work on such a board would entail. But, as I have said, I asked for a chance to consider the matter, and while considering it with the Senator from Idaho, General Johnson seemed to have developed a larger conception of the field to be covered by the proposed board. He called, advising me, in effect, that it was his wish to have something in the nature of a congressional board, which could act as a go-between between Congress and the N.R.A. congressional committee within the N.R.A. Whereupon I straightaway advised General Johnson that I would not undertake to assume that I could speak the mind of Congress, that I could reflect the mind of Congress, and that until Congress acted upon some such a proposition, I could not accept appointment at his hands. I pointed out to him that he might expect that every other Member of Congress would look upon it in the same light, if he was thinking of asking them to participate.

After the general had given every assurance that he saw the point, and agreed that that could not very well be done, he set to work to bring the Senator from Idaho and myself together with the President to discuss what might be done. Such a conference was arranged, but not since that time has there been any repeat of the request to serve upon any board, and when General Johnson says that I have declined to serve upon a board, he knows full well that he speaks what constitutes a departure from the actual truth.

There really is but one serious charge involved in General Johnson's address in New York, and to that I have just referred. But the brunt of his New York argument was this, that it was nobody's business but his own to have any concern at all with what N.R.A. was doing. He said quite emphatically, though I will not undertake now to quote him, that our criticism involved what constituted no business of ours as Senators or as private citizens. He said, among other things, that we did not know the first thing about business. When I observe the practices to which business has resorted in these last 10 or 15 years, I think perhaps I had better agree that I do not know much about business. I never have been connected with business whose main purpose was that of looting the public in the matter of the sale of securities. I have not been associated with business that has spent its time primarily in watering stocks and looting the public. But be that as it may, for the sake of the argument I am going to confess that I do not know anything about business. Yet, thus admitting, I am not ready to sit down and say that I have no right to criticize some of the practices which have been resorted to under the administration of the N.R.A. by General Johnson. I feel that I still have the right to criticize, whether I know anything about business or not.

I am reminded somehow of the case of that individual who one day stepped into an art gallery and beheld upon the wall an exhibit of paintings by one particular artist. He walked along and gazed upon each picture, and finally at one he paused longer than he had at others. The painter saw the visitor pause there and observed him shake his head. He saw upon the visitor's face a look which said, "I do not like that picture."

The artist went up to him and said, "What is the matter?"

The visitor said, "I just do not like that picture at all. I do not think it squares off with the rest of the things around here at all."

"What is wrong with it?"

"Oh, I do not know," he said, "but I do not like this, and I do not like that."

The artist said, "Are you an artist? Do you do any painting?"

The fellow said, "No; I never thought of it before. I do not know the first thing about it."

Then the artist said, "Why in the world do you undertake to criticize my work?"

Whereupon the visitor responded, "Well, not being a painter, maybe I have no right to criticize; but I am not a hen, either, and yet I know a rotten egg when I see one." [Laughter.]

So it is, Mr. President, with respect to some of the features of codes which have been approved under the administration of Gen. Hugh S. Johnson; there are among them some very rotten eggs, and I want to discuss a few of them this afternoon.

The general told us in his address in New York that we did not know what we were talking about. He said—and I quote him now:

> I think these critics do not realize that what they want is to turn the clock back 5 years to exactly the same formula of rugged individualism lately propounded by men with whom they probably would not sit in the same room. It all gets down to what is said in Proverbs: "As the dog returneth to his vomit, so doth the fool to his folly."

I think perhaps we had better not dwell upon that particular subject longer than to say that Proverbs also says something about refraining from answering according to his folly, lest he turn again and rend you.

Be that as it may, Mr. President, I insist that I do know what I want in connection with such criticism as I have offered of N.R.A. I want primarily two things. First, I want the new deal divorced from the leadership of those industrial pirates who broke America—broke her in an economic way—and destroyed her confidence in business quite completely.

Second, I know that I want help for those who are being oppressed by these codes. Men who will play fair, men who have known but the most honorable intentions, are every bit as deserving of such limited championing as has been afforded them in connection with the codes under which they have been operating.

I believe in that connection that there should be a resort by N.R.A. to a program, not one that is of aid to monopolies, but one that will help break the hold which monopolies have upon business in America today. I say that these things can be had under N.R.A. if the N.R.A. develops the proper administrative hand.

General Johnson likes to quote President Roosevelt. I wonder, following President Roosevelt as I have, why General Johnson does not follow the President as well as quote him. In his campaign Mr. Roosevelt said, among many other fine things, this:

> No industry has ever been known to purge itself of its own iniquities.

Yet, Mr. President, the N.R.A. administration by Mr. Johnson places the authority to administer codes in the hands of big business itself, which in its appetite for greater and ever greater profit sees one great need, and uses its code to wipe out their little competitors and leave a clean field for profiteering to be regulated by the code authority—to be regulated, in other words, by big business itself.

As I shall show, I hope, today, big business is in the saddle by reason of the N.R.A. codes in a greater degree than ever it has been before. I am not going to dwell at great length today revealing just how thoroughly it is in the saddle, but I do want to deal primarily with one specific industry.

Before doing that, I want to define what I believe to be the real issue in this controversy today. That issue is involved in this question: Does N.R.A. favor and help monopoly? I say it does under the manner in which it is being administered. General Johnson insists that it does not. In any event, that is the real question.

In proof of my contention, I am going to bother the Senate to go back and follow very briefly over ground that I covered on last Thursday relating to the code of the National Electrical Manufacturers Association. Just what was done under these codes is a matter which can wait a few moments while we ascertain just who wrote the codes. I would remind the Senate that when they were ready to receive codes there was one who formerly had been employed by the General Electric Corporation, who retired from the General Electric Co., came to Washington, was given an office in N.R.A. headquarters, where he advised those who had the electrical code in hand. After the code had been approved he retired from N.R.A., and becomes now the secretary of the code authority, administering the code that was adopted, and having coverage over all manufacturers of electrical machinery in these United States.

The General Electric Co.—big business, if ever there was such an institution—in the electrical manufacturing field is dictating every rule to be pursued in the conduct of the administration of that code.

Mr. President, we hear a good deal these days about government by intimidation. I wish to read two letters which have come to me within the last 48 hours, one dated January 18, the other January 20, indicating strongly what sort of intimidation exists in the business world; and then I stop to ask: Are those who are intimidating Government perhaps the same forces at work intimidating the smaller units of business in the country?

L. M. Speery, of St. Louis, Mo., writes me as follows:

> I wish to express my congratulations and sincere appreciation of your courageous stand against the monopolistic manufacturers, especially the General Electric Co. I believe these monopolies are the cause of our economic break-down.
> Having spent at one time 30 years as agent for the General Electric Co., 5 of those years not knowing I was working for them, I am in a position to give you some facts as to methods they used in monopolizing the lamp industry; how they put on a lamp war to force factories to sell out to them; how the factory I worked for lost $20,000 in 1 year trying to meet their ruinous competition before they had to capitulate (other factories had the same experience). Then they called themselves the National Electric Lamp Association, their purpose being to mantain prices.
> So it devolved on Mr. Wickersham, then Attorney General, to bring to light the fact that it was all owned by the G. E. Co., causing them to readjust their business and carry consigned stocks in the hands of their agents in order to maintain prices to the extent of nine or ten millions of dollars.
> How they obtained the patents of all those whom they bought out and how they worked the Patent Office to perpetuate their monopoly you, of course, know.

According to their own statement they sold in 1930 356,000,000 lamps and because the Jewel Incandescent Lamp Co., with whom I am now connected, sold about 10,000,000 lamps they put up the hue and cry "ruinous competition."

From up in Bridgeport, Conn., comes a letter from which I quote the following:

I read in the newspapers that you are charging the General Electric Co. with a monopoly on lamps under the N.R.A. and the National Electrical Manufacturers code.

This letter, I would point out, shows how the General Electric Co. has forced the importation of the product of Japan; how General Electric Co., though it may today put up a hue and cry about these importations, are themselves responsible for them. The writer of this letter says:

What I would like to call to your attention is the Christmas-tree lamp situation. We have been manufacturing Christmas-tree lighting outfits for the past 15 years and consume approximately 3,000,000 Christmas-tree lamps per year. We secured the Christmas-tree lamps years ago from the General Electric Co. under a miniature Christmas-tree lamp contract. One nice morning we received a letter from the General Electric Co. informing us that they were discontinuing our contract for the Christmas lamps, not giving any reason whatsoever. This, of course, left us without any lamps, and what we had to do was to import the Christmas lamps from Japan to assemble in the Christmas-tree lighting outfits which we manufacture, and had to start to create a demand for the Japanese lamps, not because we wanted to do so, but we were forced to it by the General Electric Co. on account of not supplying us with the mazda Christmas-tree lamps.

Today the General Electric Co. is complaining about the importation of Japanese lamps, for which they themselves forced us to create the demand and are still stubborn about giving contracts for the mazda Christmas-tree lamps to independent manufacturers. There are about 14 Christmas-tree lighting outfit manufacturers in the country and only 3 manufacturers are obtaining the Christmas-tree lamps under such contracts with which to supply the entire country with Christmas-tree lamps. There are approximately 75,000,000 Christmas lamps sold a year in the United States.

Under the N.R.A. we feel that every manufacturer, whether large or small, should be on an equal basis; otherwise the small manufacturer is compelled to go out of business, as the demand for American-made merchandise has been greatly increased.

By supplying the Christmas mazda lamps to all the Christmas-tree lighting outfit manufacturers the demand for the imported lamps would cease and there would be more work for the American workingman.

We are taking the liberty of writing you this letter to bring the matter to your attention, so that it may be taken up at the hearing of the National Electrical Manufacturers Code.

Here is another letter revealing the jokers that have been written into the code which is under consideration, revealing the deadly weapons that are being placed in the hands of monopoly by reason of these codes. This letter, coming from New Orleans, says in part:

The code drawn up by the National Electrical Association for the electrical contracting industry is a glowing example of just such an attempt to squeeze the little fellows out of business by means of controlling regionally the most vicious weapons in the codes.

At another point the writer says:

You will note that we have only protested three specific conditions, but the code is full of jokers which would prove deadly weapons in the hands of unscrupulous local or regional code authorities who would be vested with the power to annihilate the small contractors and exploit the buying public.

From Providence, R.I., comes perhaps the most revealing letter of them all. This letter shows how General Electric, through N.R.A., is rewarding its own selfishness and greed; how it is undertaking to wipe out all competition; how it continues to entertain the attitude of "community be damned, humanity be damned, profit is the thing and the only thing to be considered"; revealing further how the General Electric Co. in prosecuting their program of eliminating competition have made purchases of competing plants, and then have resorted to the plan of dividing the purchase price paid for the plant over a long period of years so that the seller could escape the income-tax laws. Let me read this letter:

An article in the New York Times this morning attracted my attention in regard to your complaint against the General Electric Co.

May I state that, as a former agent of this company, I could show you some harrowing situations here in New England as a result of their merciless greed and selfishness.

Plant after plant has been closed down by them all over this country. It was my job to try and dispose of some of them. Our own firm bought one and showed what could be done with them.

In the little city of Central Falls, which adjoins Providence, the General Electric Co. gobbled up an independent plant making light bulbs, a plant to which the town had granted a 10-year tax exemption to nurse along a new industry. The General Electric Co. closed it up and cast all the help adrift. The town still has an empty plant after more than 10 years of idleness. This was a serious blow to a small municipality depending for taxes on only a few industries. Within the past year it has not been able to pay its firemen and policemen.

In the case of the D. & W. Fuse plant in Providence, this company owned certain patents which the General Electric Co. wanted. They bought out the plant, closed it up, and extended the payments for it over a period of 10 years to help the seller cheat the Government out of income taxes. It is still vacant after 13 years of idleness.

In the city of Taunton, Mass., 16 miles from here, another plant, manufacturing small motors, was closed and the help cast adrift as usual. All this happened before the depression, when there was still a demand for manufacturing space from small manufacturers who could not afford to build a plant but who were willing to pay rent. Would the General Electric lease it? They would not. Reason? To keep out competition.

Now, here is a clear case where capital, in the form of bricks and mortar, could have been used by people who were willing to pay a fair price for it, and reemploy those set adrift. But what does a huge corporation care about human beings? They are too far away to hear their cries of anguish and see their sufferings as they wander from place to place seeking work.

Furthermore—

That is a political reference which I think had better be left unsaid here at this time. However, this and the other letters go to show, Mr. President, that big business, personified as it is by the General Electric Corporation, is interested not in mankind, not in the welfare of workers, not in affording work for men, but is interested alone in profit, profit, and more profit. Yet today, under the N.R.A. codes, that same type of big business men are having placed in their hands the weapons which they are using to drive whatever remains of competition out of their respective fields.

General Johnson refers to those who criticize this situation as men who are entertaining "subtle, political designs." I deny that there is any subtle political design in such purpose as is mine in presenting these cases; but after the demonstrations which we have had—demonstrations like those to which I have called the attention of the Senate, such demonstrations as General Electric has staged—I do not, Mr. President, for one, want to be led to national recovery by such men as have headed General Electric in its years of greedy war for profit and more profit. Yet here they are, these very same men, leading as code authorities back to their kind of green pastures. Here we are being led back to prosperity by these representatives of big business, who never have had vision that would let them see beyond their own noses or deeper than their own purse—these men whom the President says have never been known to purge themselves of their business iniquities—here they are, these same men, the rulers over their lines of industry today.

I must repeat, Mr. President, briefly the statement that the General Electric Co. had its men on the job writing the code, pushing it through, forcing it through, and accomplishing its approval almost before the independents competing with General Electric knew what was going on.

Just how the code which was accomplished under such an arrangement is operating, I think, is best revealed by a letter coming to me from Crescent Automotive Cables, located at Providence, R.I. I am not going to take the time of the Senate to read that letter, but I am going to urge every Member of this body to give heed to it when it appears in print in the RECORD, and I ask that it may be printed in full at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter referred to is as follows:

PROVIDENCE, R.I., January 19, 1934.

Senator NYE,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR NYE: I have been following your efforts on behalf of the smaller manufacturers who are being handicapped by the operations of the various codes.

We are especially interested in the electrical code as administered by the National Electrical Manufacturers Association, particularly clause no. 10, which is the price-fixing clause under the guise of the open-price plan.

Our particular company was formed in 1917 and for the last 8 years has been making automotive wire and cable exclusively, selling it for replacement repair purposes through wholesale accessory supply houses throughout the United States.

In the intervening 8 years this company has grown slowly and steadily along conservative lines.

Our competition comes from 4 very large manufacturers, 3 of whom are subsidiaries of very large firms in the automotive field; the fourth company is a very large electrical wire manufacturing company with an automotive wire department.

These four companies were all selling their products on an equal basis at very high prices, using every known form of selling, such as consigned stocks—ledger balances, missionary men in the field to do the actual selling for the jobber, heavy advertising, etc.

There are four smaller companies who have not been competing on an equal price basis with the four mentioned above, because they have not been furnishing the services mentioned, nor were they soliciting accounts ordinarily sold by the above four.

These smaller companies were soliciting business from the smaller accounts in the automotive accessory jobbing field.

Then there are 10 small or medium-size companies who are not manufacturers but who are assemblers (sometimes known as "superjobbers"), who would buy wire from manufacturers making ordinary electrical wire and reboxing this material under their own brand and posing as manufacturers and selling it to small jobbers and chain stores.

After the N.E.M.A. code became effective all manufacturers in this industry (whether manufacturers or assemblers or superjobbers) grouped themselves into what is known as the "automotive replacement wire and cable subgroup", working under N.E.M.A., and became a part of the electrical industry, whereas we are really an automotive product, pure and simple * * * under N.E.M.A. we were obliged to go on the open-price plan and publish our price sheet.

The four leading manufacturers immediately put in secondary, or lower-priced, lines to compete on an equal price basis with all of the other manufacturers in the field, but first inducing all others to raise the prices of these secondary lines more nearly in line with their advertised and first-quality line.

Of course, the effect of this was simply that the four largest manufacturers did not have to increase the prices on their leading lines but did have the rest of us raise our prices on competitive lines so that the difference in price between the two lines is now very small, and, in addition, they also have the competitive line and they are now soliciting business from all classes of trade, some part of which did not even interest them prior to the code.

Another feature of the operations of the price agreement, or code open-price policy, was to raise all prices to such a margin as to permit anyone posing as a manufacturer to buy at one level and resell to the jobbing trade at a higher level and the price set-up is such that the ordinary replacement-parts jobber is paying about 50 percent more, or at least 33⅓ percent more, for replacement wire and cable parts than is necessary.

Competent manufacturers such as ourselves could supply the market at much lower prices than at present with a very satisfactory profit and paying full code wages and working the proper number of hours under the code.

Smaller manufacturers are going to be forced out of business because the four leading manufacturers are usurping the entire field now on an equal-price basis.

This company, and others, are interested in having clause no. 10, or the open-price plan, taken out of the N.E.M.A. code; we are perfectly agreeable to comply with all fair-trade practices and labor provisions, but we reserve the right, or we should have the right, to contract with our customers on a basis that will give us a fair profit, enable us to run our factory in an efficient manner, and give our help an opportunity to work.

The open-price policy is working a hardship on the smaller manufacturers, who do not have the advertising expense or the missionary men in the field to do their selling for them.

When the N.E.M.A. code comes up for rehearing—I do not know the date that is scheduled—but when it does come up for rehearing, if I can be of any help in testifying I shall be very glad to come to Washington, and I will be grateful for a word from you in regards to any of the points that I have raised.

Cordially yours,

CRESCENT BRAID, INCORPORATED.
MILTON C. SAPINSLEY,
General Manager.

Consumer—Milwaukee experience. Independents woke up in September.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, after the adoption of the so-called "N.E.M.A. code" the independents finally awakened to what was being done and what had been done to them. They scampered about, organized themselves, agreed upon the need of a supplemental code, and drafted such a supplemental code, which was intended to wipe out the injustices that General Electric had forced into the code. That was in September. Through September, October, November, and December the independents rapped, rapped, rapped at the door of the N.R.A. asking for consideration. It was in September or October that I indicated interest in the matter to N.R.A., and was assured by the authorities there that there would be consideration given to the supplemental code.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President——

Mr. NYE. If the Senator will permit me to complete this point, I will then be glad to yield to him. As I was saying, the N.R.A. authorities assured me they would give heed to the supplemental code that was being requested; and lo and behold, in December there came word that N.R.A. had finally decided that they could not consider the supplemental code; that the only form in which they could consider it would be in that form which would prevail if the supplemental code were to be submitted to the N.R.A. by the code authorities which had been appointed to administer the electrical manufacturers code. In other words, if the General Electric Co. would say to N.R.A., "We wish you would consider this code", then N.R.A., said, in effect, "We will consider a supplement, but until then our hands are tied; we are helpless; we cannot do a thing." I now yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. DICKINSON. I should like to inquire whether or not the Senator has considered the question of what organizations in these respective lines or trades were able to pay dividends and whether or not the dividends were not all or practically all paid by the larger organizations that are doing the very things that the Senator says they are doing—that is, fixing up these codes so as to assure them profit even if they have not any business turnover whatsoever?

Mr. NYE. I must confess a lack of knowledge concerning the dividends that might be involved in the cases of these various corporations, but I am quite certain that what the Senator is saying will be thoroughly borne out by the facts.

Mr. DICKINSON. The report of the various companies, not only in the electrical line but in many other lines where the large concerns are in control of the codes, bears out the contention of the Senator that they are in control; they know why they are there, namely, that they are there for the selfish purpose of making profits and not of employing more labor or relieving suffering among the workingmen.

Mr. NYE. I thank the Senator from Iowa for his observation.

When N.R.A. declared that they could not touch the supplemental code of which the independents were asking consideration, I wrote an extended letter to General Johnson setting forth step by step the experiences with which the independents had met. After sending that letter I was absent from the city for a matter of about 10 days. Upon my return I found upon my desk a letter from the attorney for N.R.A., Mr. Donald Richberg, denying most emphatically that the operation of N.R.A. was one encouraging monopoly, but saying nevertheless that what I said regarding the so-called "N.E.M.A. code" was justified; that in that case my criticism was justified. Two days later came a letter from General Johnson concurring in what Attorney Richberg had said regarding that matter.

Then there followed most delightful action and consideration by N.R.A., which accomplished, among other things, the reopening of the electric manufacturers industry code and hearings were set for the 4th or 5th day of January of this year. When that day arrived the hearings were undertaken. General Johnson, Mr. Richberg, and other authorities of N.R.A., sat in listening to the testimony that was then and there offered.

There was every reason to believe there would be a reopening of that code and the insertion of provisions that would be a defense to the independents; that would curb the monopolistic tendencies of the General Electric Co. itself. But, lo and behold, after 2 days of those hearings, and in the face of the frightful information that was there placed before them, instead of taking action, instead of setting aside the code and saying, "Wait, you are not going to make that operative for a while; wait until we consider this", they postponed the hearing until the 29th day of January of this year. Since I have taken the floor word comes to me that N.R.A. has today postponed the hearing from January 29 to February 8. How many more times they will postpone it no one knows.

In any event, this terrible delay which the small industry is suffering is all but crucifying and destroying what remains of the independent industries in the country. The small fellow, if I may be permitted to use that expression, is being crushed by monopoly as he has never been crushed before because of the manner in which N.R.A. codes are being administered. Yet when one makes that contention there comes back the charge "dead cats." A man talking about "dead cats" while Rome burns!

Mr. President, on Saturday the President issued an Executive order which, it is alleged, gives the independents something that they have needed, something they have not had before. The Executive order brings the Federal Trade Commission and the Department of Justice into the picture in a way. But I wish to point out that the Executive order has not altered the set-up in the least. There is no change, by reason of the Executive order, in the order that existed Friday, the day before the order was issued.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. NYE. I am glad to yield.

Mr. DICKINSON. I want to make the suggestion that under the Executive order the Federal Trade Commission is just about as far away from the small business man in Fargo, N.Dak., as the consumers' counsel is away from the customer who is buying merchandise in Fargo, N.Dak., and there will be no chance for them to come down here and have their complaint heard. Therefore they will be crushed just as they were before.

Mr. NYE. I am not going to agree with the Senator altogether upon that statement. I think the Federal Trade Commission as constituted at the present time is ready to function in a way that will give more direct response to the interests and the needs of the smaller units of business than they have ever had before. However, that is neither here nor there. All the privilege the independent has under the Executive order of Saturday is the privilege which he had on last Friday and every day before that. He has always had access to the Federal Trade Commission. What the Executive order says to the complaining small business man is, "Take your case to N.R.A. If you are displeased by the disposition N.R.A. makes of it, then take it to the Federal Trade Commission."

In the particular case of the electric manufacturers' code, lo and behold, hearings are postponed from day to day, from week to week, from month to month, and there is no assurance when the N.R.A. is going to dispose of the case. Must the independents wait until N.R.A. has said "yes" or "no" to the supplemental code that has been submitted? They do not have to do so. If I could make my voice heard by all the independents today, I would say this in no uncertain terms, "You do not have to carry your complaint to N.R.A. You can carry your complaint, if you will, directly to the Federal Trade Commission." Then if the Congress will awaken to the fact and awaken to its responsibility, it will appropriate such sums of money for the Federal Trade Commission for the next year as will enable them to do this job of looking after the interests of the small business man.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. NYE. I am glad to yield.

Mr. DICKINSON. I want to make the suggestion that I have faith in the Federal Trade Commission, and I approve of what the Senator said with reference to them. But that does not dissipate the fact that the little business man is all alone who is a thousand or two thousand miles away from Washington. He will just close up shop and quit rather than spend all of his capital investment coming down here trying to make a showing to the Federal Trade Commission or anybody else.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NYE. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. In view of legislation enacted last spring, the Recovery Act, abolishing the Sherman antitrust law, by authority of what law would the Department of Justice intervene here? I should like to have some lawyer explain that, because as I understand it they can do all these things without violating the Sherman antitrust law because its operation is suspended.

Mr. NYE. I am not prepared to discuss that particular point as intelligently as it ought to be discussed, but I understand that within a day or two it is going to have a very complete discussion here on the floor at the hands of men who do understand the law very thoroughly.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NYE. I am glad to yield.

Mr. FESS. The question that was asked by the Senator from Minnesota is a question that has been in my mind. The Federal Trade Commission can be authorized to investigate and probably expose. I do not know, under the suspension of the antitrust laws, what else they could do. That is the query in my mind.

Mr. NYE. That is what the Federal Trade Commission can do now, is it not?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. NYE. It did not require any Executive order to accomplish it.

Mr. FESS. No.

Mr. NYE. I happen to know of a case directly in point where N.R.A. knows the opinion expressed by the Federal Trade Commission with respect to one code and persists in ignoring the word that the Federal Trade Commission gave. It involved the so-called "N.E.M.A. code". It appears very clearly from this experience that N.R.A. has absolutely no respect for the Federal Trade Commission. Whether it has any respect for the Department of Justice I do not know, but the attitude of N.R.A. seems to be that which declares, "We are holier than thou. We are beyond the reach of anything that exists in the way of governmental agency. We are beyond criticism, and, most of all, there should be no criticism from Congress or from any Member of it."

But, Mr. President, I invite attention to the fact that experience shows there is absolutely no respect on the part of N.R.A. for the Federal Trade Commission or its opinions. On the 29th day of December, 5 or 6 days before the N.E.M.A. hearing was to be conducted, an N.R.A. authority, whether it was General Johnson himself I do not know, requested the Federal Trade Commission to give consideration to the N.E.M.A. code and report to N.R.A. on their findings. On the 2d day of January the Federal Trade Commission made its report, and among other things the Commission said was this with respect to the electrical manufacturers' code:

> The price-fixing provisions of article X—

That is, of this N.E.M.A. code—> necessarily result in depriving the independent manufacturer or small enterprise of whatever economic advantage it enjoys by reason of its efficiency in operation, low overhead, including low executive salaries, etc. To the extent that this occurs there is a resultant increase toward monopoly.

This opinion from the Federal Trade Commission continues:

> There are several provisions of the code for the electrical industry, as approved on August 4, 1933, which in practice may tend to eliminate or oppress small enterprises, discriminate against them, and thus promote monopolies, all of which results the N.I.R.A. expressly prohibits.

Mr. President, with that kind of an opinion before them on the 2d day of January, with hearings pending 2 days later upon this specific code, with that information before them, I ask, why would N.R.A. dare to postpone hearings to the end of the month and then on into February, as they have done today? Because they have no respect, because they have not a care about the opinion of others, and partly, I think, because they want to show their most complete and utter defiance of any authority other than themselves.

Yet up in New York the other day General Johnson, during the course of his address, made a statement as to which I am wondering if by any chance it has relation to this particular report from the Federal Trade Commission. He said at that time—and I cannot conceive what other report he may have had reference to—

> But is still said that I suppressed a report of the Federal Trade Commission to the President on the operation of N.R.A. I asked the Federal Trade Commission to send a man over here to see if we were doing properly what we had to do. He came, but he never said a word to me. I now understand that he did report to the Commission in a paper marked "confidential"—one of those X–21 confidential spy reports which no one had the courtesy to discover to me. There is suppression for you. I now learn that somebody sent it to the President. But I never heard of that report until last night, when a self-invited counter-espionage agent told me of its subject matter.

If he is referring to the particular Federal Trade Commission report to which I have just made reference, I would ask General Johnson this question:

Have you made any effort to ascertain who in your organization, what stool pigeon in your organization, withheld that report from you?

I would ask him:

Have you fired anybody for keeping that report away from you?

I would do that, but for the fact that there comes word this afternoon that not only has that hearing been postponed to the 29th of January, but today N.R.A. calls for a further postponement to the 6th or 8th day of February.

Mr. President, I must confess that I do not longer enthuse about the prospects for large success through N.R.A. under the leadership and under the administrative hand of Gen. Hugh S. Johnson; and I say that, fine as his work has been in connection with certain phases of the early part of this recovery program.

General Johnson says he did not know about this report. Then someone within his organization has betrayed the trust that has been placed in him. Root him out.

Some few weeks ago I said, personally, to General Johnson, "You have leaks within this organization. Small business has filed complaints here. Those who have complained have been assured that they would not be compromised; and, then, within a matter of hours after they had filed their complaint, their big brother monopolistic competitors not only have known who made the complaint but have known what was in the complaint, and have proceeded to make life that much more unpleasant for the struggling little independent unit."

General Johnson challenged me at once on that statement and charged me for the moment with alleging that N.R.A. was big business' agent. I said I did not mean anything of the kind; but what I did mean was that having built up, as he had built up, that gigantic N.R.A. organization almost overnight, it was inevitable that there should be within the organization men whose principal task was that of carrying messages to their monopolistic agents or employers in this line of business and that line of business. General Johnson did not disagree. He agreed that there probably were stool pigeons within the organization, but what is being done to get rid of them? That is the question I should like to have answered for my own satisfaction today.

Perhaps the answer will be that there has not been time to act on the evidence that has been presented in the hearings condusted in the reopening of this so-called "N.E.M.A." code. No time to act? No; seemingly not where the General Electric is involved, where big business is involved, but plenty of time to go out into Indiana and down into Oklahoma and find some little 2-by-4 restaurant owner who has violated in some respects the code under which he has been operating and he has had his blue eagle taken away from him.

Oh, if only there could be one good example made of one real big business institution in this country! If only Uncle Sam would show himself with the strength and the courage to take, for example, this browbeating pirate organization of General Electric, shake it up, and put it in its place, what a blessing, what a lesson, what an example it would be!

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NYE. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Does the Senator claim that the General Electric Co. has violated its own code?

Mr. NYE. No; not at all; but I am contending that the General Electric Co. supervised the writing of a code that is in direct violation of the antitrust laws.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Well, that was the purpose of the act, was it not?

Mr. NYE. No; it was not. The act quite clearly declares that it was not.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I understood that we had to abolish the autitrust acts in order to permit business to do the things they are doing now, and that was the reason why I voted for the Borah amendment.

Mr. NYE. That was the reason why we all voted for the so-called "Borah amendment", I am sure; but be that as it may, Mr. President, the fact nevertheless remains that where flagrant violations of the spirit of the law are revealed, when the one against whom there is reflection is a great giant industrially, he goes scotfree. He has no difficulty in winning endless time, in accomplishing procrastination in consideration by N.R.A.; and every minute of that delay means death or a chance to continue life to these struggling small ones.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. NYE. I am glad to yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. The Senator speaks of the violation of law. What law have they violated?

Mr. NYE. The Senator from Minnesota is contending for a point which I think I am going to have to concur with him about; namely, that perhaps there has not been strict violation of the law.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Of what law?

Mr. NYE. Of the antitrust laws, until we amend the law by adopting the amendment which the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] is proposing at this time.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. If the Senator will permit me, I do not see how they could violate a law that has been suspended, and does not now exist.

Mr. NYE. Let me make my point clear to the Senator. The N.R.A. officials, chief among them General Johnson himself, have said, time and time again, "If these codes are found to be aiding monopoly in enlarging or continuing its monopoly, we are going to correct those codes." When the General and his subordinates down there are shown by the Federal Trade Commission and by others that there is a direct effect that is enlarging upon monopoly, then we get delay; we get the postponements of hearings from day to day, and from week to week.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. And reluctance to change.

Mr. NYE. And a reluctance—yes; something more than a reluctance to change. Now, why the reluctance, Mr. President? What is wrong down at N.R.A.? Is N.R.A. afraid of big business, or is N.R.A. big business itself?

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NYE. I am glad to yield to the Senator.

Mr. FESS. Is not the situation as we now see it operating something as follows?

Every President since President Woodrow Wilson, including Woodrow Wilson, up to the present time recommended to Congress, in some form or other, an amendment to the antitrust laws. Congress never responded to any one of these recommendations.

Mr. NYE. That is true.

Mr. FESS. Is it not true that in the face of that opposition, as expressed by a refusal to take it up, the same thing has been done by the delegation of power that permits agreements through which the thing that it is desired to get rid of is gotten rid of by suspending it?

Mr. NYE. That is right.

Mr. FESS. I think that is the dangerous part. We are suspending a law that we could not amend; and it seems to me that we very likely will suffer from the very things of which we are complaining under their interpretation of the law.

Mr. NYE. We are bound to suffer.

Mr. FESS. I assume that General Johnson claims that he is following the spirit of the whole thing.

Mr. NYE. Well, that is not altogether true.

Mr. FESS. I do not think he is, but I think he may assume that he is.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, reviewing how the General Electric Co. has accomplished the making of its code, how it sits in the seat of the mighty to enforce and administer that particular code, I desire to ask, and perhaps the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] can satisfy my question, Why is it that N.R.A. has not invited Samuel Insull to come back here and supervise the manufacture of this public utilities code that is now under consideration? [Laughter.] Is Samuel Insull any worse than men who have led in this campaign of General Electric through the last 15 years of crushing out every sign of competition that they could lay their hands on? What is the difference between their record and that of Samuel Insull? Both of them were aiming to but one end—more money; more profit; get it, no matter what method you must resort to in order to get it!

O Mr. President, I wish that we might at this time, presumably a time of enlightenment concerning the past record of big business, move in a direction that would accomplish a divorcement from that order which places recovery, which places our destiny, in the hands of the Swope, the Young, the Grace, the Schwab, the Mitchell, and the Sinclair type of business leaders, with whom we are so well acquainted here in the United States. What these men want to do, what they are using N.R.A. for, is to get back to the delightful position they occupied in 1928, before the crash came, when they were able to pay dividends upon their swollen, watered stocks, when they were able to pay themselves bonuses as executives beyond even what they were paying to the common stockholders as interest upon the money which those stockholders had invested.

Mr. Grace, of the Bethlehem Steel Corporation, likes N.R.A. He is not ashamed, he is not afraid, to tell the world that he likes it, and he wants more of it, and he hopes it is going to become permanent. Grace is the same man who sat behind closed doors with other executives of the Bethlehem Steel Corporation back in 1917, without the knowledge of the stockholders of the Bethlehem Steel, and devised a plan to get something more than their salaries for their services, devised that there should be bonuses paid to the executives. From 1917 to 1930 the Bethlehem Steel Corporation paid in bonuses to those executives $31,000,000, and during the same period of years the common-stock holders in that corporation got only $40,000,000. From 1925 to 1928 the poor Bethlehem Steel Corporation could not pay any dividend on its common stock at all; but, as I recall the figures now, it paid to this handful of executives, never numbering over 22 or 23 in a single year, something like $6,000,000 in bonuses, and in one lone year Mr. Grace, who now loves N.R.A., because he is permitted to lead in the game that is being played under N.R.A. as it relates to his particular industry, drew, in addition to his salary, a bonus of $1,600,000.

They would like to get back to those days when it was so easy to mislead and to loot the American public and their own stockholders. They would like to go on with the privilege of earning on the basis of the fictitious watered valuations which have been written into the capitalization of Bethlehem Steel and other like corporations during these many years.

On Sunday, Mr. President, the Baltimore Sun carried an editorial entitled "Mr. Grace's Contribution", which I am going to ask to have incorporated at this point in my address.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[The Baltimore Sun, Jan. 21, 1934]

MR. GRACE'S CONTRIBUTION

It is very interesting, in the midst of the warm debate between Senators BORAH and NYE, on the one hand, and General Johnson, on the other, as to the effects of N.R.A. in depressing the little man and in promoting monopoly, that Eugene G. Grace, president of the Bethlehem Steel Corporation, should come forward in an article in Scribner's in defense of the N.R.A. in its effects on industry. Mr. Grace believes N.R.A. has taught industry "a great deal which can be and must be preserved for the future."

And what is it in N.R.A. that gives the head of Bethlehem this joy? It appears that industry has been given "an opportunity to act in unison in the interest of public policy without being handicapped by competition of the chiseling type." Industry has been freed from the shackling effect of the antitrust laws. "The new conception is that of a basic industry working along cooperative lines." In his own steel industry, Mr. Grace finds that public price fixing has prevented cut-throat competition.

What we should like to know from Mr. Grace is the date on which the steel industry was subject to the "cutthroat competition" which he says N.R.A. has prevented. Our impression had been that, antitrust laws or no antitrust laws, the steel industry had been, long before N.R.A. was ever mentioned, the last place in these United States to look for any form of "cutthroat competition." We had been under the impression, which nobody ever really tried to dispel, that steel has been for years a recognized de facto cartel.

Hence, the suspicion arises that what Mr. Grace really is giving three cheers about is the fact that N.R.A. permits the steel industry under the law to do things it always has done regardless of the antitrust laws. It is true that the collusion of the steel companies on rail prices recently led Coordinator Eastman to drag the magnates before the President and to force somewhat lower prices (still uniform), but evidently that slight mishap is in Mr. Grace's opinion a small price to pay for the new freedom legally to fix prices.

As for the benefits to the public of suppression of competition, it would be helpful if Mr. Grace would explain why public price fixing will bring us blessings when private price fixing failed to do so. If suppression of competition in the steel industry and permission of price fixing are a godsend, why were we not restored to prosperity long ago? For it is a fact, written and discussed a million times. that steel prices were held up by artificial methods against the terrific downward trend of the price level as a whole since 1929.

In fact, not only among old-fashioned liberals, but among the new liberals who support the "new deal", the disparity between high fixed prices in a few monopolized industries like steel and the low general level of prices has been cited as one of the serious obstacles to recovery. How, it has been asked, over and over, could industries which use steel get started again if, while themselves operating on a low-price level, they had to pay high prices to the Steel Trust for their materials?

Mr. Grace is a gentleman who knows exactly what he wants, but, like many gentlemen who know exactly what they want, he is none too subtle. For General Johnson's sake, in the latter's debate with Senators BORAH and NYE, it is a pity that Mr. Grace has offered at this time his particular bit of ballyhoo. There may be a little sense of humor left in the country.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NYE. I am glad to yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Under the codes, these industries are prohibited from selling at prices below cost of production. In figuring their costs of production, industries like the Bethlehem Steel, heavily watered, their capital structures watered many times over, these industries having obsolete plants which they do not use any more but still carry on their backs, all figure these "dead dogs" in their costs of production. How does the Senator expect that they can pay dividends on all this dead capital unless they are permitted under the N.R.A. to charge the public such prices as they can collect?

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, the Senator voices a question that is in my mind. Of course, big business sees under the N.R.A. program as being administered now an opportunity to get back to those fine green pastures which they enjoyed so tremendously a few years ago.

Mr. President, I want to appeal to the Senate in all good faith. I want to appeal particularly to that portion of the Senate which is representative of the prevailing administration. There is no doubt in my mind that if it is true that N.R.A. is operating in the interest of monopoly today, it is not at the wish and by the consent of the President, nor do I believe that it is with or by the consent of the majority Members of this body, or of the body at the other end of the Capitol I appeal to minority Senators particularly to exercise that leadership today which will bring reforms, which will bring a reversal of policies within N.R.A., which will insure the safety and well-being of these smaller units of business.

The platform of the Democratic Party, less than 2 years old, declares very plainly what I think it is fair to assume has the sympathy of the majority Members of this body. The platform states:

We advocate strengthening and impartial enforcement of the antitrust laws, to prevent monopoly and unfair trade practices, and revision thereof for the better protection of labor and the small producer and distributor.

I believe in what are generally understood to be the principles of the N.R.A. Yet criticism from that background invites invariably the very kind of bombast of which the N.R.A. chieftain delivered himself last Thursday night in his New York speech; the same kind of bombast and "cracking down" which has thus far frightened small business men into aiding monopoly to dig a grave for its small competitors, and who, while so digging, dare not voice complaint or even suggest it to General Johnson.

The N.R.A. principle, as I understand it, was best enunciated by President Roosevelt when he said:

We are seeking the encouragement of small local industries, thus furthering the principles of a better-balanced life.

I repeat, "the encouragement of small local industries." That principle does not appear to be as clearly in General Johnson's mind as it should be. If the better things possible under N.R.A. are to be realized, it might not be the Nation's misfortune if General Johnson were to realize that dream of which he spoke in his recent address, when he said he could "whistle to the dog and walk out of the N.R.A. door when the going got too rough."

What N.R.A. needs now is less of the uncompromising, Prussian, militaristic spirit and "cracking down" policy and more of readiness, more of willingness, to look for and correct those blunders which, if left to stand, will most certainly destroy whatever chance exists today for economic and national recovery.

EXHIBIT A

ADDRESS OF NATIONAL RECOVERY ADMINISTRATOR HUGH S. JOHNSON BEFORE THE NATIONAL RETAIL DRY GOODS ASSOCIATION, PENNSYLVANIA HOTEL, NEW YORK CITY, JANUARY 18, 1934, 10 P.M. (EASTERN STANDARD TIME), BROADCAST OVER NATIONAL BROADCASTING CO. NETWORK

This is a breathing-spell in N.R.A. First in the public prints we were too violent. Then the editorials screamed "one month—one code"—we were too slow—so slow that we could never do the job. Then, due to the avalanche of codes and our efforts to accommodate them, the papers said we were men in a daze from overwork—"Exalté", as Mark Sullivan said—working 18 hours a day, punch-drunk or worse—incompetent, irrelevant, and perhaps immaterial. Now again, they say, we are dragging our anchor and that there is a bureaucratic delay in codes. It only goes to show how little you can depend on the appraisals of men who have to produce news every day. Criticism is always news, and we have no chance to answer. Considering it all, the most encouraging thing is that half of the reports say we have sold out to labor and about exactly an equal number that we have sold out to management. At least it shows if we are not good we are at least impartial. I know of no better test.

But generally speaking, the dead cats are fewer in number and have lost some of their ripeness and velocity. The criticism is more measured and benign. It is, perhaps, only another aspect of the many we have seen, but, in view of the coming of Congress, it is a welcome breathing spell—it gives us a chance to pause, get our shoes shined, our hair cut, and prepare our answers to such tremendous charges as that, in this administration of Government which pays the most meagre scale of salaries, we do pay $5,000 to a chief of staff who has challenged the attention of the whole town and most of industry and labor for downright merit, devotion, and effectiveness, and who has heretofore received and is now tendered much more than her salary in this temporary assignment—and other characteristic and weighty questions of statesmanlike disquisition. It is like asking an embattled army at a critical stage why they wear periwigs. I am fully aware that General Dawes gave the appropriate answer once and for all, and that is "Hell 'n' Maria", but I think he has a copyright on that.

But a storm is brewing—a typical attempt to whip up opposition where it may count among the greatest numbers. I refer to the claim that N.R.A. oppresses the "little fellow" and promotes monopoly. If this claim resided in code provisions that looked to suppression of earnest individual endeavor, I would not only approve it, I would lead it. That there are some few such provisions in 200 hastily assembled codes I have no doubt. For that reason we have already opened up four suspected codes to public hearing. For the reason that there are these and many other inconsistencies in these 200 codes, we are going to have all the 200 codes opened in one of the most significant of public conferences ever held, sometime in February. But an earnest seeking after truth—"honor and faith and a sure intent; a caulking rather than a scuttling of the ship"—is not what gentlemen of this ilk desire. Deserting sideline conjecture and getting down into the sawdust to make a success of a great sociological experiment by curing its few defects by constructive action and patient sweat and effort is not what these gentlemen want. They are sideline beaters of the tom-tom of public incitement and doers of nothing whatever except the composition of diatribe. That is the way they make their living and maintain their place in life. They are welcome to it, but let us appraise their work for exactly what it is.

Every time I have heard a criticism of this kind I have used a constant formula: "Well, if there is anything wrong here, come in and help us fix it. We will give you every authority, access to every act and record." With an ingenuous and sincere layman it always works, and he remains or goes away as an enthusiast or even a zealot. I made the offer in this case. But you can't do this with a politician. It is not politics to find that things are right. It is politics only to assert that they are wrong, and then, without regard to eternal verity or the laws of libel, to crouch behind official immunity and keep on so asserting. As I said, I made the offer to these gentlemen and, for one reason or another, the simple fact is that they are not here. They are still on the sidelines and their tom-toms are in perfect working order.

I thank God that the strength of my official position here is that I am without political ambition, and am free to close the window, whistle to the dog, and finally walk out the private door of my office any day that this kind of despicable thing becomes too much for my self-respect to bear. There is another strength in that, as I said would be the case; this job has been done in a goldfish bowl and there is nothing here to hide. Blunders there are here—errors of judgment and action. It may also be that, tucked away in the hurly-burly, somebody has tried to put something over. But nobody will find here a substantive or covinous fundamental error of policy, and now let us take up this "oppression of the little fellow."

Formerly, when a man went bankrupt, people generally said it was because he did not run his business well. Now, he and his friends may say, and some of these tom-tom beaters do say, "Oh! that is N.R.A." It would be a matter of indifference to these gentlemen, but the fact is that insolvencies of the little fellow led the general decline that began with a recession in bankruptcies which became marked when N.R.A. started. What I have just said is nothing more nor less than orderly, effective, and irrefutable proof of the error of the entire assertion, and any thoughtful man would put an absolute stop to its utterance; but I predict that this irrefutable fact will be a matter of complete indifference to the gentlemen who are now keening around the moorlands wailing that N.R.A. oppresses small enterprises.

If N.R.A. oppresses anybody, it does not do so by monopolistic tendency. It may do so for another reason. I can tell you the single reason and then prove it to the smoking hilt. It oppresses people who are not willing to afford decent wages and proper hours to human labor, and I am willing to take any man to the hustings on that statement, including these professional dialecticians. But they will not dare go there with me, none of them. The facts are against them and these facts are of such a nature as to put them on a very hot spot.

These people say that the big fellow does this, but I say to you that the big fellow has nothing to do with it—the law does it. The President's policy laid down the rule for N.R.A.—and lest there be the slightest question about that, I want to read to you from the President's statement of instructions, aims, and purposes, of June 16, which laid down our policy. We started then to follow it, have been following ever since, and will continue to follow it in spite of all these orators. Here it is:

"In my inaugural I laid down the simple proposition that nobody is going to starve in this country. It seems to me to be equally plain that no business which depends for existence on paying less than living wages to workers has any right to continue in this country. By 'business' I mean the whole of commerce as well as the whole of industry; by 'workers' I mean all workers—the white-collar class as well as the men in overalls; and by 'living wages' I mean more than a bare subsistence level—I mean wages of decent living.

"Throughout industry the change from starvation wages and starvation employment to living wages and sustained employment can, in large part, be made by an industrial covenant to which all employers shall subscribe. It is greatly to their interest to do this, because decent living, widely spread among our 125,000,000 people, eventually means the opening up to industry of the richest market which the world has known. It is the only way to utilize the so-called 'excess capacity' of our industrial plants. This is the principle that makes this one of the most important laws that ever came from Congress, because before the passage of this act no such industrial covenant was possible. On this idea, the first part of the act proposes to our industry a great spontaneous cooperation to put millions of men back in their regular jobs this summer. The idea is simply for employers to hire more men to do the existing work by reducing the work hours of each man's week and at the same time paying a living wage for the shorter week."

I believe in that statement implicitly. I have carried it out as a sort of religion. Carrying it out is the real oppression of small enterprise, of which men complain, and I am still willing to leave this policy to the verdict of the country.

The question about these complaints of the small employer is neither difficult nor obscure. It is simply as to the place of the greater amount of human suffering and oppression—an employer who chisels on this rule or his workers. It is whether the small employer of 5 to 30 employees who complains now to these champions (and who is the greatest chiseler under N.R.A.), or his workers are the most to be pitied. The answer is that, in spite of all that he can and has put in charges to the consumer (usually about three times what N.R.A. has cost him), he is not in distress. We know that he used to say, in 1918, "It is the war." He now says, "It is N.R.A."—just as the bankrupts do. We have heard of all the stingy, sleazy, and sweatshop products he sells as genuine. We know of the youth and leisure and laughter he has coined into greasy nickels. We know that, in spite of all this, he is not satisfied with his profits. Who is the more oppressed because he is now asked to pay wages high enough to allow his people to raise their heads in human decency? Is it he that is responsible for the happiness of his 5 to 30 employees, or of the 10 to 100 people dependent on them, whose leisure and laughter he has coined? If the answer is he, then these critics are correct and this law ought to be amended. But if the answer is that it is they who are to be considered, then these gentlemen should not prevail. But, as champions for the "peepul", it would be well for these men to consider painfully just who they do represent—labor or the bourgeois small employer. I will take issue with them on either supposition. In a distressed democracy, they might be making one of the greatest of political mistakes.

The true "small enterprise" in this country is the man who has no more capital than his courage, no more machinery than his brawn, and no more establishment than the loved few that rely on his efforts. Do these critics propose to ally themselves with the worker or with the employer, large or small?

Generally speaking, there has been nothing but benefits from these codes to small enterprises. Chain stores have been curbed in their attempt to come in and whipsaw them. The big fellow has been estopped from looking them over and hitting them in their weak spots. Their prices have been stabilized, and old assaults—like the "stop-loss leader"—have been eliminated from the competition against them by the big fellow. You never hear them complaining of the protection that has been given to their income. This whole talk of oppression relates to the fact that they have been required to increase their outgo for the purpose of creating employment and increasing wages. And again, I say that if that be oppression, it is not oppression due to monopolistic tendency, but oppression due to the national policy of spreading employment and creating buying power by relieving human beings of that wage slavery which well nigh destroyed this country. If that be monopolistic, let these Palladiums make the most of it. If these tom-tom beaters want to make an issue of this, my room is 4850, Department of Commerce, and the door is always open for any information or attack they want to make. They have not been here in any honest quest.

There will be a distinct movement to repeal this act under this slogan of "oppression of small enterprise." It won't be a forthright and open motion for repeal. These gentlemen do not dare to do that. Some of this will be done by a Senator whom I love for his intestinal fortitude perhaps more than any Senator other than CARTER GLASS, but yet I shall oppose him on this paradox as long as breath within me lies. It will be an attempt to put in the act about three lines forbidding action by any industry in unison and, in effect, substituting the Federal Trade Commission for the N.R.A.

Now, I yield to no man in my admiration for the Federal Trade Commission, but at this crisis we must look facts in the teeth, and by moving in to control this administration it will kill the recovery program. That Commission was set up to do exactly what N.R.A. was set up to do—to improve our industrial condition by letting industry act in unison under the supervision of the Commission. It was created against the background of a law saying to industry, "If you do act in unison, you will be hung, drawn, and quartered." Industry naturally asked, "What can we do?" and the reply to that was, in effect, "That is a secret. Go ahead and act. After you act we will tell you whether you can do it or not, and if you have guessed wrong, the 'auto de fe' will commence." Even the actual practice of asking what industry had done was an economic Spanish Inquisition or a Mark Twain version (under modern Talbots and Bishops of Beauvais) of the trial of Joan of Arc, sometimes lasting a year, at terrific expense and continuous uncertainty.

The net result was failure of the original purpose—dismal and complete—and, in my opinion at least, a negative cause of the depression of 1929. There was, and there is, about as much cooperation between the Federal Trade Commission and the industry as there is between a lion tamer and a black-snake whip, a revolver, and a strong-backed chair, standing in a cage with six great jungle cats snapping and snarling on six star-spangled hassocks. That is their version of economic planning and industrial self-government. Yet that is the condition that these economic genii want to restore. My respects to them, because I admire them, but they know about as much about industry as I know about the queer icthyology of the great Pacific Deep.

I have said that I think this theory ruined the country in 1929. I think I can say without presumption that I studied the causes of that depression and foresaw it, and I believe that the failure of purchasing power to absorb the products of industry began in 1926 and 1927 and that the system they proposed was responsible for it. If there is one thing that we have learned, it is that price cutting by one device or another, whether exploitation or technological development, is paid for by wage cutting and unemployment and that the inevitable resulting descent by a downward spiral into an economic hell, by cities, by regions, by industries, and at last by nations at large, is due to this contraction of purchasing power. This must be so not as a matter of conjecture but by certainty. The sum total of national income in last analysis is wages; indeed, I will go a step further and say that the total national income is wages of one kind or another and that the only way cost is cut—at long last—is by wage cuts. It is by lower total wages for human labor that recessions and depressions occur. On the other hand, the only way to keep production up is to keep wages up and this, as the preacher in Ecclesiastes says, is the end of the whole matter.

The net and final result is the destruction of purchasing power (and so of industrial activity and eventually the cause of economic collapse)—the destruction of wages. That is exactly what happened in this country beginning in 1926 or 1927, and it culminated in the smash-up of 1929. With industry and labor in complete disorganization, due to the theory now proposed, they were powerless to prevent this result by united action, and the reason they were powerless was the very law and the very administrative action under it which are now proposed to be restored.

In the language of the pundits it was the doctrine of laissez-faire. The outward and visible signs of that doctrine were the law as it stood before N.I.R.A. and the governmental method and organization created by the law set up under it.

The change of N.I.R.A. said in effect, "Now we will at least tell you what you can do. If what you do has none of the evil, but only the good effects at which we aim, we will let you do it. If it turns out that evil predominates good, we will restrict or modify what you do until only good remains." In order that this very result should ensue I asked the very gentlemen who are now concerning themselves with this kind of problem to sit in here and try to see that only good results. They did not accept. I conjecture that they did not want to because a contrary course is the reason for their being. I believe that they preferred to sit aside and conjecture evil. So long as they both shall live they will have to answer as to why they did not consent. That circumstance discounted 50 percent of what they now say. They could have cooperated. They elected otherwise.

I understand that they now say that I suppressed certain reports in this connection. If I repressed reports it was not that I refused anything to them, because I offered them open access to everything, as I now offer open access to any responsible person. But they also say I repressed certain reports to the public. I ask every newspaperman to bear witness—they throng these halls—that I never suppressed a routine report on one of these codes. What I ask these newsmen to say is whether there was ever any refusal of access to any action or record in this administration.

But it is still said that I suppressed a report of the Federal Trade Commission to the President on the operation of N.R.A. I asked the Federal Trade Commission to send a man over here to see if we were doing properly what we had to do. He came, but he never said a word to me. I now understand that he did report to the Commission in a paper marked "confidential"—one of those X21 confidential spy reports which no one had the courtesy to discover to me. There is suppression for you. I now learn that somebody sent it to the President. But I never heard of that report until last night when a self-invited counterespionage agent told me of its subject matter. There was nothing in it but a charge that we have made mistakes. Nobody is louder in that assertion than am I. Apparently the President—gentleman that he is—ignored it. But these critics do not ignore it. I submit the bona fides of that kind of action to the public conscience. It in such business as, unfortunately, goes on all too frequently in this great whispering gallery where men are prone to prostitute their duty to play the game and "crook the pregnant hinges of the knee where thrift may follow fawning." I knew personally of one instance during the war where one high official put a dictagraph on the private telephone of another and then tried to present the record to Woodrow Wilson. He did what 95 percent out of 100 of you would do. He turned on his heel and walked away. There is no need for any of that sort of thing here. We have no secrets. Between the middle and end of February (as I said before) we are going to have a public conference on every approved code, and then the world and his brother—anybody who has the slightest grievance—will have his day in court with everything wide open.

There remains the charge that divisional chiefs and deputies are industrially minded. Of course, most of them are. How else are the problems of industry to be considered? But this is a balanced organization—balanced throughout. And not a code has gone through that has not had the scrutiny of labor, economists, industry, and consumers. Scarcely one code has been signed which does not have the written approval of each division. Of course, none can dominate because responsibility for final action is mine, to me, and I have stated publicly the faith that is in me. It is to raise wages and spread employment as an economic doctrine and in spite of anything. It may be wrong, but I believe it is the President's faith. To raise them higher and to spread them further is one of the objects of the February conference. If this be treason, make the most of it. If I should be gotten rid of, now is the time to do it. There are two alternatives: one is to go back to the old system (and God help the country if we do). The other is to put another man in my job. Doubtless there are thousands who could do it better. But if he be a protagonist of some of the ideas I am attacking, this program will collapse.

It is important what is written into the codes, but far more important is what comes out of them. I think the Good Master said something about the differences between what goes into the mouth of a man and what comes out of it—and of scribes, Pharisees, and hypocrites. If evil comes, we will repress it. If good comes, everybody will benefit. But as long as I stay here, people actively under my supervision need no longer act in fear of anything but their good faith and they will not act in peril of this kind of sniping. They will get a square deal. All we ask is that they act in the open and with every affected interest fully heard.

I am informed that I am assailed as a tyrant. Well, there are tyrants and tyrants. There is such a thing as a tyrant speaking for a highly vocal political minority. Perhaps the worst type of tyrant is the one who gets his power from a sanction which nobody can defend because the sanction rather than the tyrant is inherently tyrannical. I ask you to observe all this and tell me which is the real tyrant—the man who is down in the arena of general popular appraisal or the man who speaks from the rostrum of an assailable minority. These men have really nothing to support them but the width of their mouths and the volumetric capacity of their lung power. I think I am able to take my part in respect of this issue on any stage where the test is logic and merit.

They have nothing to offer except their own concept of laissez-faire, and I readily concede that I have nothing to offer except that the concept of economic planning should be substituted for the old thesis. In the process some chiselers must go and, whether they be big or little, I believe that the country will be the better for their leaving.

On thoughtful canvassing of the whole subject, and in view of all of these considerations, especially the vital one, I think these critics do not realize that what they want is to turn the clock back 5 years to exactly the same formula of laissez-faire and rugged individualism lately propounded by men with whom they probably would not sit in the same room. It all gets down to what is said in Proverbs: "As the dog returneth to his vomit, so doth the fool to his folly." As in 1929, and all that has passed since, so they unwittingly want to revisit those noisome scenes and to do so in company with the most reactionary critics of the President's program. They do not want to do that. The fact is that they do not know what they want, and men in that condition ought not to speak at all. We have had enough of blind leaders of the blind.

I want to get back now to a favorite subject of mine—the Blue Eagle. He is, above all, the modern symbol of popular and local self-government. There is nobody within the sound of my voice who isn't as familiar with the more prominent issues at the Capital as anybody here and who does not have some judgment on them. Does it make much difference what legislators think of the President and his recovery program as long as the people think what they may? Well, the blue eagle offered a way in which people could add to all that Government might do to enforce the recovery program—a force more potent than any at the Government's command, than any law, proclamation, or statement—the force of public opinion.

You know, without any formality of public hearing or ceremony, whether an employer is living up to his obligations. Why, then, do we have to invoke a machine to determine such questions? The blue eagle is enough.

He means public cooperation and public determination. And if this is true, why is there any hesitation?

We can set up machinery until we are purple in the face. But this law is for you. It is entirely in your hands. If you ignore the blue eagle, so will employers ignore it. If you insist on the blue eagle, so will they, with all that it implies. The President's employment program was not designed for employees. It was designed for the people and the blue eagle as a badge for those for whom the law was invented. Exact it from every manufacturer, every merchant, every person whom you patronize. If you do that it means that you also support what the President is doing. If you neglect it, it means that you do not care whether people are exploited.

It is of the very essence of the new deal. If you do not keep it flying, nobody can. I adjure you to exact it. Those who are not with us are against us, and the way to show that you are part of this great army of the new deal is to insist upon this symbol of solidarity as followers of Peter of the Keys drew a fish on the sand and Peter the Hermit exacted the cross on the baldric of every good man and true.

It is a new thing. It is the difference between direct and representative government. It was not so long ago that the people could not elect a President. It was a lesser time since that people could not elect their Senators. We have come to the time that people are invited to enforce their laws. The exponents of an elder era do not at all want this. Most income in the United States is less than $1,800 a year. That is what makes prosperity. The question of whether it shall be maintained or not is in your hands; and the way to enforce what you want is not to write letters that go either to the waste basket or a form clerk, but to insist on the blue eagle. It means something and it is going to mean more. As the Angel of Death, at the Passover, omitted those houses that showed no crimson palm mark on the lintel, so do you pass by any shop window or advertisement that does not display the eagle—and that recalls another story about people who ease their indignation by writing letters: Casper Milquetoast, in a fit of public spirit, wrote to the Pullman Co. about insects in his berth and promptly received a complimentary and apologetic letter two pages long. He proudly displayed this to his friends as proof that corporations do have souls, until some cynic discovered and pointed out to him a faint penciled note on the back "Send this S.O.B. the bug letter."

So do not swallow the "letter system." Stick to the blue eagle. There are teeth in that. It is the first time that you have ever been given a direct voice in the execution of a law in your favor.

All this brings one to the question of sweat shops. There is no law on earth—there is only one power on earth—that can stop a man from taking advantage of poverty and destitution via the sweat shop. It is the only way to protect childhood—to sew the blue eagle in a garment. That subject has been fully canvassed and it is beyond argument. The blush of shame, the sense of having participated in a conspiracy against youth and decency, must flush the cheek and perch on the pillow of any American who will purchase or use anything to go on his body which does not have this stamp of humanity toward employees. It is so effective that the opponents of it are contesting it in the courts and we now have a case that might well be captioned "Sweatshops v. N.R.A." It is in favor of these small employers and other rugged individualists that the present attack (and small employers are generally sweatshops) is being made. I leave judgment and action to you and all you have to do is to exact the blue eagle.

The whole secret of recovery is to maintain the buying power of workers everywhere. It is just as necessary to maintain the buying power of our agriculture, and we have not done that. But Henry Wallace—and there is no greater exponent of the new deal—will tell you that farm prices for all but export surplus commodities, go up and down precisely with the wages of labor.

A man who knows more about the Northwest than anyone I know, told me yesterday that more money had gone in there under the new deal recently than twice the value of their crops. The South is humming with what they have received. The Midwest has lagged slightly but is now getting theirs. The Pacific coast is slightly behind but, combined with what Henry Wallace has done for the farmer and what we have done for workers, buying power has been created, and there is no question that both commerce and industry are in for as active a business as they have ever enjoyed. It is no time for critics to croak. Business is on its way. The missing link has been supplied by the President's monetary plan for stabilization and, with that, there is nothing left to croak about. Part of this aid is artificial—has been supplied by governmental distribution.

The gamble is whether, after starting the upward spiral by whatever means, it will continue. I think it will. I think that what was needed was confidence and that it has come.

Normal turn-over in this country is over $80,000,000,000 and most or all of it is wages. In its wildest dreams Government could not spend, for business activation, more than 10 billions. All it can do is to prime the pump with a pint for the purpose of producing gallons. In my opinion those gallons are on their way and, if you will permit me, I felicitate you.

I am speaking to a congress of retail dealers. You have a code. The good that may come from it is in your hands. Will you use it for exploitation or for the real purpose for which it was intended? That purpose was fair dealing among yourselves and toward the public. It was not to give you any more advantage than what the best of you had always done and the whole question now is whether you will so use it. If exploitation is your purpose, I want to tell you now that you cannot get away with it for long. You might for a little while. But those of you who have been in close contact with this administration know that, sooner or later, you would be caught and when caught justly castigated. The good that you can do by sticking to a process of absolute nonchiseling is immense. The bad that you can do by furtive and smart-aleck attempts to get away with something is beyond my expression.

The net result would be complete loss of public confidence and perhaps withdrawal of your code. It would be repudiation by you of the President's confidence in you and withdrawal of public support which at present is high. There is no way to appraise these intangibles, but I do not need to. Industry is on test and knows it. I know, beyond peradventure, that you will meet that test. The President went all the way in stating his belief. At the risk of a considerable prolixity I want to read what he said about that too, and especially in view of the infinitesimal political attack which has recently been made. This is what he wrote when he gave us our marching orders:

"It is a challenge to industry which has long insisted that, given the right to act in unison, it could do much for the general good which has hitherto been unlawful. From today it has that right.

"Many good men voted this new charter with misgivings. I do not share these doubts. I had part in the great cooperation of 1917 and 1918, and it is my faith that we can count on our industry once more to join in our general purpose to lift this new threat and to do it without taking any advantage of the public trust which has this day been reposed, without stint in the good faith and high purpose of American business."

Today a manufacturer in whom I have the utmost confidence told me about a wholesaler with a magnificent order who brazenly asked him for a secret rebate several percent below his principal competitors, and the manufacturer's answer was, "Give me that in writing, because I want to crucify you." That is the kind of cooperation we need to put this thing over—and to justify the belief that confidence can be put in the good faith of American business.

One of the great troubles of our present situation is that industry may persist in thinking of the Government's recovery program with no more perception of its general purpose and effect than a bee working on the construction of his own honey cell thinks of the Federal tariff on honey.

Industry is so accustomed to doing its thinking in watertight compartments with an eye single to immediate advantage of itself, that it is difficult to get over the habit even when its own welfare, if not its own existence, depends on the success of the whole venture. The real difference between critics and the administration is that they think industry can never do it and we, at least, are sure it will.

Take you retail dealers, with your worries about increased costs to you individually, consequent to N.R.A., our insistence on shorter work hours—and we are going to insist on shorter ones—and a minimum wage for your various branches of service. How shall you compensate? There are two ways—a flat mark-up and a more or less stationary price relying on increased volume to take up the difference. On those questions you again have a direct Presidential request. Let me read once more from our Bible and yours—dated June 16—the President speaking:

"I am fully aware that wage increases will eventually raise costs, but I ask that managements give first consideration to the improvement of operating figures by greatly increased sales to be expected from the rising purchasing power of the public. That is good economics and good business. The aim of this whole effort is to restore our rich domestic market by raising its vast consuming capacity. If we now inflate the prices as fast and as far as we increase wages, the whole project will be set at naught. We cannot hope for the full effect of this plan unless, in these first critical months, and, even at the expense of full initial profits, we defer price increases as long as possible. If we can thus start a strong, sound upward spiral of business activity our industries will have little doubt of black-ink operations in the last quarter of this year. The pent-up demand of this people is very great and if we can release it on so broad a front, we need not fear a lagging recovery. There is greater danger of too much feverish speed."

This request was not at first generally heeded and the effect was a little-buyers' strike. Your part in helping the President to bring back recovery is not to kill the goose that lays the golden egg. If I had only nine words with which to address you, I could do it with more substantial and worth-while effect than all these 27 pages. I would rise here and say:

"Keep prices down. For God's sake, keep prices down."

That and that alone is the royal road to recovery.

In closing, I want to quote to you one of the most inspiring pronouncements that ever dropped from the lips of man. Up to the advent of the President he was my particular idea of what a man can and ought to do in public service. He had grievous faults, but they were characteristic American faults, and in a moment of inspiration he said words that might well have come from the mouth of John Bunyan, and they were these. I commend them to my chief critics who from time to time refer to him as their mentor and friend. They never qualified on this prescription by their ideal. I quote—

"It is not the critic who counts, not the man who points out how the strong man stumbled or where the doer of deeds could have done them better. The credit belongs to the man who is actually in the arena, whose face is marred by dust and sweat and blood, who strives valiently, who errs and comes short again and again, because there is no effort without error and shortcoming; who does actually try to do the deed; who knows the great enthusiasm, the great devotion, spends himself in a worthy cause; who at the best knows in the end the triumph of high achievement; and who at the worst, if he fails, at least fails while daring greatly, so that his place shall never be with those cold and timid souls who know neither victory nor defeat."

AGREEMENTS UNDER AGRICULTURAL ADJUSTMENT ACT

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, a day or two ago I attempted to have considered Senate bill 2284, relating to contracts and agreements under the Agricultural Adjustment Act, the object of which is to exempt certain Senators and Representatives who unfortunately own farms, and who, under the criminal and civil law, may not enter into contracts with the Government to reduce their acreage, as the Government is trying to get other farmers to do.

At the suggestion of Members of the House and of the Senate and of certain members of the administration, I have introduced this bill exempting from the operation of the laws to which I have referred those Representatives and Senators who, by virtue of owning farms, cannot comply with the law. It applies only to acreage in production.

I ask that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill at this time.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, when this matter was called up Friday, I objected to immediate consideration. I have expressed myself many times as being opposed to the practice of taking up a measure on the calendar when the calendar is not being called unless great emergency exists. At the time the Senator called up the measure and asked consent for its immediate consideration, I could not see that any emergency was involved. I am not admitting that there is any emergency now.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, contracts are being let now, and the time for their consideration will close on the 31st of January. If we are to comply at all, we will have to enact legislation of this character.

Mr. McNARY. I know of the very great and proper interest of the Senator from South Carolina. I am not going to object at this time. I wish to ask the Senator a question, however. Am I correct in understanding that the bill exempts Members of Congress from the operation of an old statute?

Mr. SMITH. Only as to this particular matter.

Mr. McNARY. That is exactly what I said. I wanted the Senator to make it clear that no general exception is made, but the bill is applicable only to the A.A.A. and the operation of that organization, and is limited to Members of Congress.

Mr. SMITH. That is correct.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the provisions of section 3741 of the Revised Statutes (U.S.C., title 41, sec. 22) and sections 114 and 115 of the Criminal Code of the United States (U.S.C., title 18, secs. 204 and 205) shall not apply to any contracts or agreements heretofore or hereafter entered into under the Agricultural Adjustment Act.

HOME OWNERS' LOAN CORPORATION

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate Resolution 148, which was submitted by me this morning.

The resolution (S.Res. 148) was read by the Chief Clerk.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I am familiar with the main purposes of the resolution. I have no objection to its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, this morning the Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL] asked that the resolution go over temporarily in order that some modifications or amendments might be made thereto. In deference to his wishes, I should like to modify the resolution by adding to the first paragraph thereof the following:

And salaries paid State managers, State attorneys, and State chief appraisers.

I also ask to modify paragraph 4 by adding after the first semicolon:

The number in process of consideration; the number not yet taken up for consideration; the number of.

The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] suggested that some specific date be included, and I therefore add to the first paragraph of the resolution:

As of the close of business January 15, 1934.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as modified.

The resolution, as modified, was agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Federal Home Loan Bank Board be, and is hereby, directed to furnish the Senate the following information concerning the operations of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation as of the close of business January 15, 1934:

1. The number and location of State and District agencies (including the District of Columbia) of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation and salaries paid State managers, State attorneys, and State chief appraisers.

2. The number and location of branches and branch agencies in each State employing salaried representatives.

3. The number of salaried employees of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation in each State, listed by States, including salaried employees or agents in branches or branch agencies, and the total amount expended in each State by the Home Owners' Loan Corporation for personal services; traveling expenses, and office expenses, from the date of the creation of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation.

4. The number of applications for loans received by each of the several State agencies, listed by States; the number in process of consideration; the number not yet taken up for consideration; the number of loans which have been closed in each State; the total amount of the loans closed in each State, whether cash loans or closed through the issuance of bonds, and segregated so as to show the total amount of cash loans and those closed by the exchange of bonds of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation for mortgages or other liens on homes.

5. The total number of employees, by States of residence, employed in the central office of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation in Washington, and the total amount paid for personal services, traveling expenses, and office expenses by the central office of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation since the approval of Public, No. 43.

6. The total number and amount of applications for loans finally rejected by the Home Owners' Loan Corporation or its branches by States.

7. The amount of the capital stock of the Corporation subscribed by the Secretary of the Treasury on behalf of the United States, as provided in subsection B of section 4 of Public, No. 43.

HISTORY OF COMMODITY INDEX

Mr. DAVIS. It must be evident to all that we are entering into a period such as St. Paul referred to when he said:

Old things are passed away; behold, all things are become new.

I have been talking at considerable length recently with Dr. Ethelbert Stewart, formerly Commissioner of the Bureau of Labor Statistics. Dr. Stewart and I were closely associated during the 10 years that I was Secretary of the Department of Labor. He has been highly respected as a statistician and economist, serving with our Government for nearly half a century. Without question, he has had a more intimate association with the development of the commodity index of the Department of Labor than any other person. He is a notable authority in this field.

In these days when the thought of all of us has been directed to a close study of price levels, unusual consideration has been given to the commodity index of the Department of Labor, which is now generally recognized as the most comprehensive and authoritative price index in this country.

In my recent interviews with Dr. Stewart we have been talking over the history of the commodity index. In view of the fact that there is so much current reference to a commodity dollar, I desire to review the development of the commodity price index, explain what it is and what it is not; why it was developed and how it was developed; what it means, and, incidentally, something of the struggle passed through by the Bureau of the Department of Labor which was entrusted with the problem.

For very many years farsighted economists have realized that there was some sort of relation between the volume of money in circulation and the price of commodities. Of course, the experts in this field have not altogether agreed. I know of no subject upon which they do agree. For centuries, at least, there have been two schools of thought—those who adhered to the quality theory of money, and claimed that the volume of money had nothing to do with the price of things purchased; the others who held to the quantity theory of money, or that prices are more or less related to the volume and availability of the circulating medium.

Probably the first attempt to measure changes in the commodity price level was that made by the Italian, G. R. Carli, whose work was published in 1784, or 150 years ago. His purpose was to measure the effect upon the purchasing power of money caused by the discovery of America, and the consequent inflow of gold and silver into Europe through Spanish channels. His methods were very crude. He secured the prices paid for grain, wine, and oil in the year 1500, and figured the percent of change in price upon these things in 1750. Then he added these percentages together, and divided the total by three. It would not be conceded by any economist today that his results were very conclusive, however startling they might be.

The second index was developed by Sir George Schuckburg-Evelyn in England in 1798, using at first the methods of Carli, but later much enlarging his group of articles and improving his method of computation. The school of thinkers who created the classical political economy were deeply interested in the violent fluctuations in prices which accompanied the Napoleonic wars. Several attempts were made to measure these fluctuations.

In 1833 G. Poulett Scrope suggested the establishment of a "tabular standard of values."

Again, after the gold discoveries in California and Australia—that is to say, in the forties—there was a great rise in prices. Prof. W. S. Jevons in England, and Adolph Soetbeer in Germany, added much that was really worth while to both the theory and the practical compilation of index number of prices.

Up to this time the methods had been applied, at least for the most part, to the explanation of rising prices, but with 1873 began a prolonged period of falling prices which developed the subject from a different angle. During this period the British Association for the Advancement of Science appointed a committee with Prof. F. Y. Edgeworth as secretary and directing force. The committee was appointed—

For the purpose of investigating the best methods of ascertaining and measuring variations in the value of the monetary standard.

By the very language constituting the committee, therefore, there was an attempt to make the issue regarding the question of value the monetary standard, or the medium of exchange, instead of making the issue the exchange of articles. The British and to a great extent the American school of alleged thinkers have consistently adhered to this point of view ever since.

One of the oldest of the index numbers still in existence is that of the London Economist, which began in 1869 to compute what can be fairly considered an index from the prices it had been gathering from 1864.

The Sauerbeck English index dates from 1886.

In Germany, Conrad developed an index series in 1887, though using and in a sense making his work a continuance of the work of the investigations begun in 1864 by Laspeyres.

The American Bradstreet index began in 1897.

In 1891 a committee of the United States Senate, usually referred to as the Aldrich committee, authorized the then Department of Labor, now the Bureau of Labor Statistics, to make a huge collection of price quotations, extending back to 1840. The number of items covered varied for different years. For instance, they carried the prices of 85 commodities from 1840 to 1391, while from 1860 to 1891 200 commodies were carried. This was an "unweighted" index, and the commodities carried were selected largely on the basis of the ease with which prices could be secured. It was figured upon a 10-year basis; that is, the average price for the 10 years from 1880 to 1889, inclusive, was considered to be 100.

Meantime, in 1881 Mr. H. C. Burchard, the then Director of the Mint, compiled an index covering the years 1825 to 1880 from price quotations that had been printed in the reports of the Secretary of the Treasury, supplemented by such prices as he could secure from New York newspapers.

In January 1901 Dun's Review began publication of its index numbers, which is gradually carried back to 1860. The Bureau of Labor Statistics, at the conclusion of the work it did for the Aldrich committee, organized a continuing index, published first annually, then semiannually, then quarterly, and finally monthly. This, as stated, was not a "weighted" index in the present sense of the word until 1913, when the entire method of computation was revised, a thoroughly comprehensive system of weighting was adopted, and a reliable form of wholesale-price index numbers established.

Now, let us see exactly what an index number is. Former Commissioner of Labor Statistics Ethelbert Stewart says:

The price-index number is an attempt to express in a single figure the average of a number of price changes at some definite time in relation to some other definite time designated as the base.

Prof. Irving Fisher says:

An index number of prices, then, shows the average percentage change of prices from one point of time to another. The percentage change in the price of a single commodity from one time to another is, of course, found by dividing its price at the second time by its price at the first time. The relation between these two prices is called the "price relative" of that one particular commodity in relation to two particular times. An index number of commodities is an average of their price relatives. (Irving Fisher, The Making of Index Numbers, p. 3.)

This index of 1913—and, incidentally, I think 1913 was chosen because the figures for that year were the latest price quotations available; it was the full year last past when the compilations were made—ran on until the year 1927. Commissioner Stewart on several occasions took the matter up with me concerning an entire revision of the wholesale-price index number. His position was that a great many new commodities had entered the markets; that the weightings were out of date and no longer accurate; that the base of 1913 was antiquated; that in his judgment pre-war conditions would never return; and that we needed to measure from a present living standard and not from a standard which was dead and could never return; also, that the index as then carried probably had an oversupply of agricultural products, of raw materials, and that finished manufactured products were probably not fairly represented in the list, and he therefore wished to increase very materially the number of articles carried. I agreed with him, and the work was started.

Now let us see what happens. The first and most serious problem is to decide as to what commodities to include in the index. In the index compiled in 1913 the Bureau made a rule that it would include all items of which $1,000,000 worth or more entered into the markets of the United States, provided, of course, a definite unit could be devised and continuous prices could be secured. By 1927 there were so many articles of which we produced more than $1,000,000 worth that this hard and fast rule had to be abandoned. Again our products had become so complicated that it was not always possible to fix upon a practical unit upon which to base price. To illustrate what I mean, let me add that it is perfectly safe to say that a bushel of hard winter wheat is a bushel of wheat; that a bushel of no. 2 corn is a bushel of corn; by a little stretch of the imagination we can say that a pair of shoes is a pair of shoes; but it must be obvious that a woman's hat means nothing, and a very great number of articles of everyday commerce, the volume of which is very important in the country's trade, must thus be excluded from any index because of the impossibility of establishing a unit. Secondly, after having agreed on a unit, there must be some way of determining the number of those units produced and entering into the commerce of the country. In the early days the census compiled this information upon pretty broad lines and general classifications. Even when it had the figures as to total production, it was not always possible to tell what proportion of the total product entered into the world markets. How much grain, for instance, was fed to hogs and cattle and how much was sold as grain? That which was fed to hogs entered the world markets as livestock and was priced as hogs on foot, not as grain by the bushel. When this preliminary work was done, it was found that 550 commodities were available. The matter of selecting these commodities was not done by the Bureau of Labor Statistics without the fullest, most thorough consultation and cooperation with those bodies, both governmental and private, which were in best position to understand the matters in hand. Not only the selection of agricultural products was made in consultation with the Department of Agriculture but the markets from which the prices were to be secured were all discussed and agreed upon by the various governmental bureaus and organized agencies, whether public or private, that could furnish the most dependable information.

In 1931 revision increased the number of commodities to 784. These are weighted at present by the amounts of each article entering into commerce as shown by average of the census of 1927 and 1929 plus imports when there are any imports. The value of these combined weights in the market at the average price in 1926 was $54,717,380,000, or nearly $55,000,000,000. This, it must be admitted, is a pretty fair-sized sample. These 784 commodities are divided into 10 groups. Group 1 is farm products, with a weighting value in 1926 of $9,413,212,000, or 17.2 percent of the aggregate weights. Group 2, foods, with a value in the index of $13,288,643,000, or 19.4 percent of the whole. Group 3, hides and leather products, $1,653,409,000, or 3.02 percent. Group 4, textile products, $5,444,979,000, or 9.95 percent. Group 5, fuel and lighting, $8,054,211,000, or 14.72 percent. Group 6, metals and metal products, $8,470,623,000, or 15.48 percent. Group 7, building materials, $4,454,884,000, or 6.34 percent. Group 8, chemicals and drugs, $967,209,000, or 1.62 percent. Group 9, house-furnishing goods, $1,638,551,000, or 3 percent. Group 10, miscellaneous, $5,048,711,000, or 9.23 percent. These groups are divided into subgroups as the material will permit. Anyone wishing to see how each item is weighted and the relation of each item to its group and the whole can find all these details published by the Bureau. (See Bulletin 572, pp. 92–110.) All must agree that this Bureau deals in the open, puts all its cards on the table face up, and plays no favorites.

The market centers from which to secure prices were selected after most careful consideration in conference with those most able to advise. The Department of Agriculture, for instance, agreed on seven types of wheat, and upon Chicago, Kansas City, Minneapolis, Portland, and St. Louis as being the localities from which prices should be secured. Wherever commodities had a central controlling market, such, for instance, as leather in Boston, prices were secured there. Cotton prices were secured from Galveston, Tex., New Orleans, and New York. In the manufacturing groups prices were secured whenever possible from the point of manufacture, from the manufacturers themselves, and are the first sale price. In the case of agricultural products, livestock, and so forth, this was utterly impossible for the Bureau of Labor Statistics to accomplish, and hence the warehouse price, or first sale beyond the farmer, was taken as the price.

I have given some intimation as to how the weighting was secured. In the revision of 1913 the method of arriving at the weights was to take the average production as shown by the census or such other sources of information as could be secured for a period of 5 years, using as a weight the average of 5 years' production. In the revision of 1927 and the subsequent revision of 1931 the average of two census periods was taken as the measure of weighting. For instance, the yield of grain might be unusually high, or in the census year taken the crop of grain, because of drought or some other reason, might be abnormally low, and it was thought best to use an average of 2 census years as the basis of weighting. Of course, the fight was on the base price line of 1926. Neither Commissioner Stewart nor the Bureau of Labor Statistics have at any time said that 1926 was normal or that 1913 was normal. They have persistently disavowed any thought of connecting the base line index year with normalcy in any manner whatsoever. The Bureau took the position that the base line was simply a point from which to cite, a target, something to compare with; the more definite that target was, the more clear statements based upon it would be. Of the various indexes compiled throughout the world, very few yield to the illusive delusion of a broad base. The United States Bureau of Labor Statistics index is the average price by months for the year 1926.

In Austria the federal statistics bureau, carrying but 47 commodities, has a base period of January and June 1914. Belgium has as its base period the prices in April 1914. Canada, like ourselves, has the year 1926. China, copying after our older index, carries 147 commodities with a base price as of February 1913. Czechoslovakia has July 1914. Denmark carries the year 1913; Finland the year 1926. France is practically carrying two indexes composed of 45 commodities; its two base periods, one the spread of 10 years from 1901 to 1910, inclusive, and another of the single month of July 1914. However, more recently she has established a new series, carrying 126 commodities, with the year 1913 as a base. Germany has a base year of 1913. India has a base of July 1914. Italy is carrying two bases, 1913 and 1926. Japan is carrying two bases, October 1900 and July 1914. The Netherlands and New Zealand are on the wide base, although the former has also a 1-year base. Norway and South Africa have a yearly base of 1910 and 1913. Sweden has a yearly base of 1913. Switzerland has a base of 1914 and another computation on the 2 years' base of 1926 and 1927. Great Britain, after having changed her base of 1913 to comport with the Bureau of Labor Statistics index, is now computing it on the year 1924, carrying both bases.

From about 1927, or even a little before that, it began to be very apparent that the wholesale-price index number or the measure of price levels of commodities in the wholesale market was to assume a very important role in the discussion of the world's financial affairs. Criticisms of the Bureau's index number began to arise from various quarters. It was claimed that this work should not be done by the Bureau of Labor Statistics. In the first instance it was claimed that it should be in the Department of Commerce because it was a measure of commercial transactions and had nothing to do with labor.

Some of the most feeling conferences between Commissioner Stewart and myself were over this proposal. He claimed, first, that the Bureau had made a more thorough and unbiased study of the subject, had had more experience and drill in methods, was not acting for any commercial interests or class, that it had developed the scheme from a time when it was not considered of great importance and had perfected it to a point and carried it over into a time when its real value and importance were beginning to be appreciated, and that therefore it should remain in the Bureau of Labor Statistics undisturbed. Again I agreed with him. Nevertheless, the Department of Commerce, Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, did put out a series of what purported to be index numbers. A committee was formed to try to harmonize what seemed to be a duplication of work.

The Department of Commerce at that time was getting its information largely through industrial associations. It was adopting many changes in methods which seemed to give it a right to continue to work. For instance, it quoted the prices of building material—lumber, we will say—laid down on the site of the building, while the Bureau of Labor Statistics figures were wholesale prices at the most general wholesale markets. Stewart was able to show, however, that many of the Department of Commerce prices were secured through the associations; were not, from his point of view, prices at all but were what is known as "sales realizations."

Let me illustrate with the matter of lead pencils alone. The association which controls the sales and production of lead pencils get reports from all sorts of qualities of pencils. Lead pencils wholesale from 10 cents to $1.10 per dozen, according to the quality. The association reported the total sales per month in dollars and cents, that is to say, the sales realization. Stewart pointed out that one month two large concerns, like the United States Steel Corporation, might buy a thousand gross of grade 1 pencils at $1.10 a dozen, while the sale of cheap pencils would remain practically the same, and the report would show a very great increase in money receipts from pencil sales, whereas there had been absolutely no change in price of pencils. The Department of Commerce insisted that precisely what it wanted to know was the amount of money that entered into commercial transactions. The Bureau of Labor Statistics insisted that what it wanted to know was the price of commodities. So for the time being, at least, the matter was more or less harmonized and both continued the work.

The Department of Agriculture proposed to start an index of its own on the ground that what it wanted was the price the farmer received for his produce on the farm. The Bureau of Labor Statistics did not pretend to obtain the price that the farmer received for fat cattle. It quoted the price paid for fat cattle in slaughtering centers. The Department of Agriculture also insisted upon knowing what the farmer paid for agricultural implements on the farm, while the Bureau of Labor Statistics figures showed the price at which they sold at the factory. Conflicts not only of jurisdiction but of interpretation naturally grew up. The Department of Agriculture saw butter as a house product made on the farm; the Bureau of Labor Statistics saw it as a purely factoryized commodity made in creameries located in the cities or towns.

Perhaps the worst assault came from the Federal Reserve Bank Board. They wanted not only a broad base, which, from Commissioner Stewart's point of view, utterly obscured the facts, but were insistent upon divisions and subdivisions of the classes of commodities into capital goods, consumers' goods, raw materials, goods in process. At last the whole theory was attacked by the statistician of the Federal Reserve bank on the ground that it did not carry sales of bonds and stocks, mortgages, real estate, and so forth.

One can readily see what could be done with an index number upon which volume of the circulating medium was to be based if the construction of that index number were in the hands of the interests controlling the volume of circulation. There were some earlier conflicts which seemed to have some basis in reason, as when the War Industries Board insisted upon getting out its own wholesale price index, as it stated, for the purpose of seeing how the fluctuation in prices occasioned by the war was operating in the interest or to the detriment of certain groups of industries. This index, which was probably very fairly handled, ceased to exist, of course, with the repeal of the act creating the War Industries Board.

A more recent revision of the index of 1931 was the result of the continual hammering of certain groups, principally directed by the Department of Commerce, that the index was still overbalanced by farm products, raw materials, and had too small representation of so-called "consumers' goods or finished products." Commissioner Stewart increased the number of commodities from 550 to 784, most of the increase being in the so-called "groups of finished or consumers' goods."

Every manner of impossible suggestion was poured in from every conceivable source. It was insisted that locomotives and all types of railroad equipment, shipbuilding, and many such industries should be incorporated in the group from which the index was compiled, and considerable of time and money was spent by the Bureau in trying to satisfy people, who, as it seemed to me, were simply suggesting difficulties and impossibilities—not that they had any interest in industries, but the interest was in breaking down the compilation of any index by the Bureau of Labor Statistics, which had so little means to expend in this direction. It does so happen that locomotives were estimated for and built by the ton, which would seem to give the unit. Ships are built by the ton of finished product, and on the face of the thing a ton is a reasonable unit of price, but, as might be expected, when the Bureau of Labor Statistics began to investigate, the ton price on a locomotive was based upon plans and specifications of the amount of machine tooling and work that had to be done to conform to certain specifications, with the result that the ton did not mean the same thing upon any two engines or any two boats. I simply refer to this as an example of the extent to which the Bureau was driven in its attempt to satisfy everybody.

The Bureau of Labor Statistics has throughout its entire history had a well-deserved reputation for being absolutely impartial in its collection and its presentation of facts. It certainly has no ax to grind; and from my long contact with it, it seems to be reasonably free from bias.

To show the danger of any selective process in the compilation of index prices, let us take any month. Take the months of September and October 1933: Of the 784 commodities carried in the index, there was a general increase in price index from 70.8 for September to 71.2 in October; but of the 784 commodities, 199 increased in price, 185 decreased in price, while 400 remained unchanged.

How easy for a person or persons, corporations, or groups to carry back this thing for the series of years, as can be done from the Bureau of Labor Statistics figures, and select a group, the prices of which are generally upward throughout a long period of time, and make the kind of an index of wholesale prices that will show a gradual trend upward.

Or how easy in the case of another group to select commodities that have for several years been tending downward and construct a wholesale commodity price index that will show over a series of years a general decline, and from this group of 400—over half the commodities carried by the Bureau for the months indicated—which showed no change, how easy it would be to construct an index which would show that the waters were perfectly calm.

All around us is discussion about basing a commodity dollar upon a price index, and all around us are commodity indexes, the fathers of which would each be willing to have the child of their brain selected as the basis for whatever of fluctuation in the form of currency the Government may be able to effect.

I am glad to say that in the last few weeks the argument in favor of bringing in various other indexes has very much subsided. The general opinion now seems to be, and Prof. Irving Fisher has definitely said that the best index is that of the Bureau of Labor Statistics. If we are to try a financial experiment as hazardous as this one will be at best, certainly we should at least attach it to an index compiled with consummate honesty and sincerity, compiled without bias, and with as great a degree of sincere, intelligent application and efficiency as it is possible under present conditions to secure.

I have conferred with Prof. Irving Fisher and other exponents of the commodity dollar, but as yet have not been able to bring myself to accept this position. However, even though I do not advocate the commodity dollar, if we are to attach our monetary system to a commodity index, I wish to say emphatically that the one which has been developed by the Bureau of Labor Statistics should be definitely and specifically named in the law; and the finances of that Bureau should be definitely and permanently strengthened to enable it to keep this index up to its present degree of excellence. While most of the men with whom I was closely associated in that Bureau are no longer there, my interest in the work which they started will continue. I know the work the Bureau has done; and the record of nearly half a century of absolute squareness and fair dealing should be kept in mind.

I have today talked only of the wholesale price index. Later I want to take a few minutes on retail price and the cost-of-living indexes.

GOLD VALUATION OF THE DOLLAR

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I had intended to address the Senate this afternoon, but I find I shall not have an opportunity to do so. I desire to announce that I shall address the Senate tomorrow as soon as I can get the floor.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KING in the chair), as in executive session, laid before the Senate several messages from the President of the United States submitting nominations, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Arkansas.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 30 minutes p.m.) the Senate adjourned until tomorrow, Tuesday, January 23, 1934, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS

Executive nominations received by the Senate January 22 (legislative day of Jan. 11), 1934

SUPERINTENDENT OF THE MINT

A. Raymond Raff, of Philadelphia, Pa., to be Superintendent of the Mint of the United States at Philadelphia, Pa., in place of Freas Styer.

MEMBER OF THE CALIFORNIA DÉBRIS COMMISSION

Maj. Elroy S. J. Irvine, Corps of Engineers, United States Army, for appointment as a member of the California Débris Commission, vice Lieut. Col. Henry A. Finch, Corps of Engineers, relieved.

APPOINTMENT IN THE REGULAR ARMY

DENTAL CORPS

To be first lieutenant with rank from January 1, 1934

First Lt. H. Beecher Dierdorff, Dental Corps Reserve.

APPOINTMENT, BY TRANSFER, IN THE REGULAR ARMY

TO AIR CORPS

First Lt. James Frederick Phillips, Corps of Engineers, with rank from September 28, 1927.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, JANUARY 22, 1934

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Reverend Dr. Raphael H. Miller, pastor of the National City Christian Church, Washington, D.C., offered the following prayer:

O Lord, in whose hand our breath is and whose are all our ways, we approach the duties of each adventurous day in the recognition of our humble dependence upon Thee. We thank Thee for the exacting tasks and perilous choices that make us men and pray that Thou wilt heighten and inform our human faculties with the divine spirit of understanding and of power. Help us this day to find temporal meanings in Thy everlasting word, save us from cynicism and despair in the presence of tasks that are too great for us, and lift up our eyes to see the eternal background against which all our acts find worthy and enduring meaning. Rekindle upon the vacant altars of our hearts the fires of moral passion and spiritual hope that our spirits may not falter before Thy divine requirements nor our vision contract before the urgent needs of men. Renew within us this day, O God, the sense of a reality of Thyself and sustain us from the unfading resources of Thy love and care. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, January 20, 1934, was read and approved.

NAVY DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL—FISCAL YEAR 1935

Mr. AYRES of Kansas, from the Committee on Appropriations, presented a privileged report from that committee on the bill (H.R. 7199) making appropriations for the Navy Department and the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and for other purposes, which was read the first and second time and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered printed.

Mr. SWICK reserved all points of order on the bill.

THE DEVALUATION OF THE GOLD DOLLAR AND THE RESTORATION OF NORMAL PRICE LEVELS

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks by including therein a speech which I delivered on yesterday over the radio on the gold bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ELLENBOGEN]?

There was no objection.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the following radio address delivered by myself from station WJAS, Pittsburgh, January 21, 1934:

Last week was a momentous one for the Congress of the United States. Fundamental principles concerning the currency of the United States, the possession and ownership of all monetary gold in the United States, and the future of our trade, both foreign and domestic, were involved.

On Monday, January 15, shortly after the opening of Congress, a message arrived from the President of the United States, requesting legislation to improve the financial and monetary system of this country.

President Roosevelt and former Presidents of the United States have sent many messages to the Congress, but few have been as important and have dealt with such fundamentals as did this one.

In the message the President declared that "the issuance and control of the medium of exchange which we call money is a high prerogative of government." The President asked Congress to enact a law which will vest in the Government of the United States the title to and possession of all monetary gold within the United States, so that the gold could be used as a permanent and fixed metallic reserve.

The Constitution provides in article I, section 8, that "the Congress shall have power to coin money and regulate the value thereof." The power of Congress to pass this legislation is therefore clear.

THE PROVISIONS OF THE BILL

Let me explain to you the most important features of the bill. They are as follows:

Under our present law there are 25.8 grains of gold in each gold dollar, or, to put it in a different way—an ounce of monetary gold has a definite value, fixed by a previous act of Congress, of $20.67. Under this bill the President is authorized to change the content of gold in a gold dollar, and is directed to reduce that content by not less than 40 percent, and by not more than 50 percent. That is, the President is given the power to give a new value to the dollar by reducing its content of gold 40 to 50 percent. If the reduction is 50 percent, then monetary gold will have a value of double the present amount; that is, it will be worth $41.34. As a result the dollar will be depreciated in terms of gold, or gold will be appreciated in terms of the dollar.

Of course, that does not mean that the unit of the dollar, as such, will be changed. A dollar will still be a dollar and still have 100 cents. Let me repeat, the gold content of the dollar will be changed, thus bringing about a substantial change in prices, in wages, and in salaries, but the dollar as a unit will, of course, be the same.

PRESENT ABNORMAL VALUE OF THE DOLLAR

The purpose of these provisions is to restore the dollar to a normal purchasing power. In the last few years the purchasing power of the dollar has increased enormously. In 1933, for instance, a dollar would purchase much more goods than it did in 1929. Another way to express the same thing is by saying that the price of commodities or goods has been greatly reduced. If you consider 1926 as a normal year and compare it with 1933, you will find that the commodity price index, which was 100 in 1926, was only 60 in March 1933. That means that something which sold for an average of $1 in 1926 only brought 60 cents in March 1933.

You might think at first glance that cheaper prices for the goods which you buy are desirable. That is not so when there is a general fall in prices, because the tremendous fall in the prices of all goods and commodities was responsible for throwing millions and millions of our people out of employment and for bringing about a tremendous reduction in the salaries and wages of those who were still employed. The restoration of normal prices will go a long way towards creating jobs for those who are now unemployed and for increasing the wages and income of everyone.

THE BURDEN IMPOSED BY THE ABNORMAL PURCHASING POWER OF THE DOLLAR

The swollen purchasing power of the dollar, as it exists today, has made the burden of debt upon the home owners, the farmers, and the middle class wellnigh unbearable.

Here is what it does:

The dollar of today as compared with the dollar of 1926 has a purchasing power of $1.43. So that, if in 1926 you incurred a mortgage debt on your home of $5,000 and must repay that mortgage today, you are not repaying $5,000 but $7,150 in terms of real purchasing power. Father Coughlin is entirely justified when he says that such a dollar is not a sound dollar nor an honest dollar. It is a dishonest, a cheating dollar.

The present dollar cheats every person who owes money. It cheats the wage earner and the salaried employee, because the low prices of goods and commodities have forced down wages and salaries.

At this moment I might say that every precaution should and, I trust, will be taken so that prices of goods will not rise quicker than the earnings of the wage and salaried men and so that consumers will be protected.

A $2,000,000,000 STABILIZATION FUND

The bill before Congress also creates a $2,000,000,000 stabilization fund, a fund which the American Government will use to defend us against depreciated currencies of foreign nations. Many foreign countries have depreciated their own currencies in order to receive a part of the foreign trade which we have heretofore enjoyed. This must be prevented in the future. The stabilization fund will be used to protect our foreign trade and to preserve our currency at a level which will serve the best interests of the United States and of our people. This fund will be useful in attack as well as in defense.

THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT WILL ACQUIRE TITLE TO ALL THE GOLD

Another section of the bill takes all the gold now owned by Federal Reserve banks, amounting to 3½ billion dollars, and vests the title and ownership of such gold in the Government of the United States. You will remember that several months ago private persons who owned gold coins were required to deposit their gold holdings in Federal Reserve banks and received in exchange for their gold coins circulating bank notes.

At that time it seemed a grave injustice that gold should be taken from individuals and should be given to the Federal Reserve banks, which are owned by the banking interests of the United States. That injustice has now been remedied. With the passage of this bill—and the bill was passed by the House of Representatives yesterday—the gold will be taken from the Federal Reserve banks and will hereafter belong to the United States as a whole. At last all the monetary gold in the United States—the gold that is necessary for a permanent and fixed metallic currency reserve—has been taken from the hands of the bankers and has been placed into the ownership of the Nation as a whole—something which should have been done a hundred years ago.

LIBERATION FROM THE DOMINATION OF WALL STREET BANKERS

Through this ownership of gold Wall Street bankers have dominated the financial, the business, and the industrial life of the country.

At last the step has been taken—fundamental and far-reaching—a step that will remove the iron grip of financial giants from the throats of our people; a step that will bring a more stable dollar, a sound dollar, a dollar that will not be too high and unfair to the debtor, nor too low and unfair to the creditor.

A step has been taken to lessen the burden of debt, a debt which has become unbearable for the home owner, for the farmer, and for the middle class. The basis has been laid to bring about, to restore, the normal value of the dollar, to stimulate our trade—both foreign and domestic—and to bring better times.

And on the pages of history will be written in indelible letters the name of Franklin D. Roosevelt, for if he accomplish nothing else, America will never forget that it was he who freed the American people from the domination of greedy and selfish bankers. It will never forget that Franklin D. Roosevelt returned to the people the essence of government, and that which has always been rightfully theirs.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. GUYER. Mr. Speaker, I give notice that I shall ask unanimous consent on January 29, the anniversary of the admission of the State of Kansas into the Union, to speak for 20 minutes upon the career of John James Ingalls, the one hundredth anniversary of whose birth occurred on December 29.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to announce that at the proper time I shall make unanimous-consent request that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DONDERO] address the House on Lincoln's Birthday on the life and character of Abraham Lincoln.

NAVY DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL—FISCAL YEAR 1935

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H.R. 7199, making appropriations for the Navy Department and the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and for other purposes; and pending that motion I should like to inquire of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SWICK] what requests he has for time under general debate?

Mr. SWICK. I have requests for about 3 hours.

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. I think there are requests for about 3 hours' time on this side. Suppose we just carry on general debate this afternoon?

Mr. SWICK. That will be entirely satisfactory.

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, pending the motion I ask unanimous consent that general debate continue this afternoon, the time for general debate to be equally divided between, and controlled by, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SWICK] and myself.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr AYRES].

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill, H.R. 7199, the Navy Department appropriation bill, with Mr. LANHAM in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. May I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SWICK] if he desires to yield some time at this time?

Mr. SWICK. I will yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER].

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I have taken some time at this point for the purpose of calling the attention of the House and the country to certain facts that I believe are of the utmost importance.

In the first place, I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that under the Constitution the Congress is delegated the authority to appropriate money. Through the entire history of the country we have very assiduously guarded our rights under that authority. For the purpose of showing to the House and to the country how necessary it is that we maintain that right and that authority I want to recite to you a little of the history of the last 8 months. I want to recite to you some of the things that have been done in the name of emergency and in the name of relief. I want to show to the House and to the country how necessary it is, if we are to preserve an ordered Budget in this country and proper appropriations, that the House of Representatives continue to lay out these appropriations and to originate them. What an impossible situation we get into when we turn that authority over to the bureaucrats.

You will all remember that last June we were called upon to appropriate $3,300,000,000 to the Executive, to do with just as he pleased, practically—that is the way it was laid out—to allot and to appropriate, and regardless of whether or not those items were for things that the Congress itself would authorize and appropriate for if it were brought up square-toed before the Congress. That appropriation was supposed to take care of relief. Just by way of prefacing, let me say to you in a general way that $1,500,000,000 of that $3,300,000,000 was allocated by the bureaucrats to be used at a time subsequent to the 1st of July 1934, and of that $1,500,000,000, $300,000,000 was allocated to be used subsequent to the 1st of July 1935, one year and a half from now; and very substantial proportions of that $300,000,000 were allocated to be used after the 1st of July 1936, at a time when those in authority now tell us the depression would long since have been over, and in face of that allotment of one and one half billion dollars to be used after the 1st of July we are now being flooded with propaganda to appropriate more money for relief, when there is a billion and a half allotted by the bureaucrats to periods beyond the time when they tell us it is not going to be necessary.

Mr. KVALE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. KVALE. It occurs to me that perhaps a large share of that $300,000,000 authorized to be spent subsequent to July 1, 1935, is for the completion of projects which are now being begun and which cannot be completed in 1 year's time, such as the upper Mississippi waterway development. Would that be true?

Mr. TABER. Well, now, it is true that those projects cannot be completed within that time, but they were not relief projects. They were propaganda projects, and the bureaucrats were catering to the propagandists.

There possibly is not anything that could better demonstrate to this House the absolute necessity of allocating all the funds that we appropriate.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. BYRNS. The gentleman, as I understand, takes the position that Congress should have allocated the entire sum of $3,300,000,000.

Mr. TABER. If it was necessary to appropriate it at that time.

Mr. BYRNS. Yes; I so understood the gentleman. Now, of course, the gentleman knows that Congress has been working under unusual conditions and circumstances. This money was appropriated primarily for the relief of the unemployed with the idea that when expended it should be expended in some constructive way so that those receiving relief would be rendering some service to the Government rather than be given doles.

Now, I ask the gentleman, would it not have been absolutely impossible for Congress to have allocated the $3,300,000,000 to the various projects covering construction of small and large projects as the gentleman indicates should have been done? The gentleman knows if that had been proposed his committee would necessarily have had to consume not weeks but months in undertaking to say whether or not those particular allocations were proper. The delay would have defeated the whole purpose of the appropriation.

In the very nature of things, I may say to the gentleman from New York, it was necessary to intrust the expenditures of these funds to some officers of this Government in whom the people had placed their confidence.

Mr. TABER. I may say to the gentleman from Tennessee that it would not have been impossible for Congress to have done that. It would not have been impossible for the Congress in the space of 2 weeks to have covered this picture.

Now, I shall go through the list; and when I get through, I shall be glad to have the gentleman point out to me those projects that Congress at that time was not competent to pass upon.

Mr. BYRNS. Will the gentleman permit me to make this one other observation, because I do not want to interrupt his remarks. The gentleman recalls, of course, what was called the "Garner bill", introduced at the last session of the Seventy-second Congress.

Mr. TABER. I do.

Mr. BYRNS. If I recall correctly, I think the gentleman himself was one of the most severe critics of the proposal for the construction of certain buildings.

Mr. TABER. It was a "pork barrel" bill.

Mr. BYRNS. And I assume that if the allocations had been made as the gentleman says now should have been made with reference to this fund, it would have had, perhaps from the gentleman himself and from other Members of the House, considerable criticism as to the manner in which it was to be expended.

Mr. TABER. I may say to the gentleman from Tennessee that I believe now, and believed at the time the Garner bill was introduced, that it was a "pork barrel" bill. It transcended almost anything we had dreamed of up to that time; but the pork-barreling of the bureaucrats is so far beyond it that there is no comparison. The bureaucrats can go so far beyond Congress in pork-barreling money that there is absolutely no argument on the subject.

Mr. BYRNS. I understand the gentleman does not complain of the amount which was appropriated, but that his complaint is directed solely to the way in which it was done.

Mr. TABER. I do complain of the amount which was appropriated, because I do not believe that a lot of these projects which were in contemplation provided substantial employment to justify them or that the projects justified themselves; and I do not believe that anywhere near so much money was necessary to provide the actual relief that was necessary. That is my position.

Mr. BYRNS. That is a matter of opinion.

Mr. TABER. That, of course, is a matter the gentleman can discuss and about which he can hold his own opinion; but I am stating what I believe. I am making the same statements today that I made here the 10th of June.

Now, I shall say one or two words by way of preface before I run through the list. It has always been customary for the Congress in making appropriations to provide in the current fiscal year funds to be used in the succeeding fiscal year.

For instance, it provided sometime in 1933 the funds to be used in the fiscal year 1934, except for minor deficiency items. Following the usual custom, we at this session should provide funds to be used for the fiscal year 1935; and the funds which are to be used in the fiscal year 1936 would be provided in the next session of Congress. However, instead of waiting for the legislative appropriation bill of this year—and I direct attention to pages 80–A and 81–A of the Budget message—there was allocated for the completion of the Library of Congress Annex, $2,300,000. This could just as well have waited and been carried in the legislative appropriation bill this year. There was no excuse for putting it in an allotment of this fund which was to provide relief.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Had Congress already authorized the construction of the annex to the Library of Congress?

Mr. TABER. Yes; my understanding is that it had.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. That being the case, why should they not allocate money to go forward with that work, thus providing employment, instead of waiting until next year?

Mr. TABER. They did not provide for work, because the work is not going to come until after the 1st of July next.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. They have cleared the site. Somebody had to work to clear the site.

Mr. TABER. That was a small item. Little less than $500,000 was spent.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. But it helped the unemployed. They are probably working on plans, and this gives employment to draftsmen and architects. The purpose in allocating the money was to give people work now, not next year.

Mr. TABER. It should have been done in the proper manner. This money should have been allocated by Congress to the specific purpose.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. That is a poor excuse. Congress is responsible for the completion of this annex, for Congress authorized it. What difference did it make in what manner the money was secured? If men could be given work while Congress was not in session, I think we should commend those responsible rather than condemn them.

Mr. TABER. But Congress should not delegate authority for a bureaucrat to abuse.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. I think the gentleman is about the most valuable man his side of the House has in Congress today. But I want to tell him that if he will go and look behind the present Library Building, he will find that all those old brick buildings covering that entire block have been razed to the ground, have been removed, and that the block of ground is clear now for the new building he is speaking of and about which he is arraigning Congress. Money had to be appropriated before the above could be accomplished.

Mr. TABER. I do not believe in segregating money to things that do not provide for relief out of so-called "relief appropriations" and then being out of money to take care of your relief obligations.

Then there are a great number of allotments for independent establishments. I shall not mention the real small ones, but I shall go down the line on the big ones.

There is an allotment of $65,190,000 to the Civilian Conservation Corps to be used after July 1 next. There was absolutely no excuse for that, because it does not represent the continuance of a contract; it was an item that could well have been taken care of in the current appropriation bill.

There was an allotment to reserves of $30,000,000.

There was an allotment of $31,000,000 to the Tennessee Valley Authority. Unquestionably this could have been taken care of in the regular appropriation bills to come along in this session of Congress.

There was an allotment in the Department of Agriculture of $6,000,000 for physical improvement, tree diseases, and so forth, that could well have been taken care of in our regular Agricultural appropriation bill.

Mr. ARNOLD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I would rather wait until I finish this list, if the gentleman will permit. Then I shall be glad to yield.

There was an allotment of $215,000,000 for Federal-aid highways. This has always been taken care of as the money was going to be used. This is not available for expenditure until after July 1.

There was an allotment for forest highways of $7,500,000—and these are the ones available after July 1, 1934—an allotment for forest roads and trails of $6,200,000.

There is an item for public-land roads of $1,500,000, an allotment for animal-industry construction of $490,700, for plant industry $1,000,000, and miscellaneous items totaling for the Agricultural Department allotment beyond July 1, 1934, $238,321,800.

For the Department of Commerce there was an allotment for the Coast and Geodetic Survey of $6,000,000, which has been withdrawn. There was an item for construction and repair of lighthouses, vessels, and aids to navigation, of which $2,153,000 was available in the fiscal year 1934, which we are now in, and $2,925,000 will be available in the fiscal year 1935 after July 1 next, and will operate largely to reduce the regular appropriations for the year 1935 which we are making here and covering mostly items which have heretofore been taken care of in the regular annual appropriation bill. There was also available approximately $300,000, which is not to be reached until after the 1st of July 1935.

In the Department of Interior there were allotments totaling $197,500,000, of which $58,400,000 were available in 1934, $111,300,000 in 1935 after July 1, next, and $27,500,000 not until after July 1, 1935.

When we have given contract authorization or otherwise, we have never appropriated money until it was to be spent. We have sometimes given contract authorizations, but we have not made the funds available.

I come now to the Labor Department, and find for immigration stations—mostly small items that can be built quickly; there was $1,500,000 available in 1934, the current fiscal year, and practically $400,000 available in 1935 after July 1, 1935.

We come to the Navy Department. The Navy Department report is probably right in front of the gentlemen. Please turn to page 4. You can see how that was allocated. There was $53,000,000 out of $274,000,000 allocated for the fiscal year 1934, which we are in now. There was $146,000,000 allocated to be spent in the fiscal year 1935, $69,000,000 allocated to be spent in the fiscal year 1936, and $5,000,000 to be spent after the first of July 1936.

Mr. GOSS. Nineteen hundred and thirty-seven.

Mr. TABER. Nineteen hundred and thirty-six. That is the fiscal year 1937.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. Not until I finish with all these bureaus.

In the State Department there was a total of practically $2,000,000 allocated, of which $1,200,000 was available currently, and $750,000 available after July 1 next.

For the Treasury Department there was allocated to the Coast Guard $24,800,000, of which $13,693,000 was available in 1934 and $11,000,000 was not available until after July 1 next. There was allocated to public buildings $39,000,000, of which $10,000,000 was immediately available, $22,000,000 not available until after July 1 next, and $7,000,000 not available until after July 1, 1935.

For the War Department there was $7,500,000 allocated to airplanes, of which $3,500,000 is available in this year and $4,000,000 not until after July 1, 1934.

For construction of buildings there was allocated $57,000,000, and that was largely for buildings which the Congress and the departments had been asked for previously. There was allocated $35,000,000 for use immediately, $19,750,000 for use after July 1, and approximately $2,000,000 for use after July 1, 1935.

For seacoast defenses there was $1,750,000 for use after July 1 next. For ammunition, $5,500,000 currently and $500,000 after July 1. For roads and drainage in Puerto Rico, $950,000 for use currently and $540,000 for use after July 1.

For flood control there was allocated $37,000,000 for use currently and $6,694,000 for use after July 1. For the Winooski River Dam, $360,000 for use currently and $1,195,000 for use after July 1. For rivers and harbors there was allocated $40,000,000 for use currently and $27,000,000 for use after July 1 next and $6,600,000 for use after July 1, 1935.

For the Missouri River the allotment was practically all for use currently. For the upper Mississippi River there was allocated $16,000,000 for use currently and $16,000,000 for use after July 1, 1935. For the Bonneville Dam in the Columbia River there was allocated $10,000,000 for use currently and $7,000,000 for use after July 1 next and $3,000,000 for use after July 1, 1935.

For the Fort Peck Dam in Montana there was allocated $8,000,000 for use currently, $15,000,000 for use after July 1, and $7,000,000 for use after July 1, 1935.

For projects for State and municipalities there was allocated $203,000,000 for use currently and $182,000,000 for use after July 1. For railroad projects there was allocated $83,000,000 for use currently and $93,000,000 for subsequent use.

Of the total altogether, including projects that had been allocated between current use and use subsequently, there was allocated for use currently $1,836,000,000, leaving $1,173,000,000 for use in the fiscal year 1935 and approximately $300,000,000 for use after July 1, 1935.

In making those allocations, very largely items have been entered into which have been accustomed to appearing in the annual appropriation bills and which cut down the bills that we are now considering.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 5 minutes.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. TABER. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. The gentleman is not finding fault with the amount appropriated for the different items but is finding fault with the method of appropriating, as I understand it.

Mr. TABER. I am finding fault both with the method and, in many cases, with the amount.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Which ones, for instance, does the gentleman find fault with?

Mr. TABER. Well, I would not allocate any $70,000,000 for the irrigation project on the Columbia River.

I would not allocate at the present time, frankly, more than enough money to begin construction on one of the 6-inch-gun cruisers, because I believe—and I have always believed on the Appropriations Committee—we ought to build one and get it right before we go ahead. After we get it right, I would be in favor of going ahead just as fast as we can. I am afraid we will get into the same difficulty we did with the 8-inch-gun 10,000-ton cruisers, where in the first block they found so many defects in them that they have not yet been able to correct all of them.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. The gentleman has read, probably, three or four dozen items, and out of that number the gentleman picks one or two that he criticizes.

Mr. TABER. Oh, I could pick hundreds of them. I would not go along with two thirds of them.

Mr. BLANCHARD and Mr. PIERCE rose.

Mr. TABER. I yield first to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I want to get some information, if I can, on the C.W.A. In all of these sums allocated for expenditure after 1934 and 1935, is there anything to prevent reallocation of some of these amounts for use in the extension of the C.W.A. activities?

Mr. TABER. I would not want to pass on the legality of that, but I will just call the gentleman's attention to the fact that an allotment of $6,463,000 was made to the Coast and Geodetic Survey and was withdrawn. Therefore, I believe that portions of these allotments should be withdrawn, and if it were necessary to continue real relief work, that should be done.

Mr. ARNOLD. Will the gentleman now yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. ARNOLD. The burden of the gentleman's argument is that these allocations out of the $3,300,000,000 fund were made sooner than is necessary, and then the gentleman states, in reply to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZPATRICK], that he would not approve two thirds of the projects. The gentleman, of course, is a very profound student and has made a careful study of this matter of unemployment relief. If we eliminated two thirds of the projects, which the gentleman has said should be done, how is he going to take care of the unemployment problem and the relief problem in this country, unless we resort to the dole system?

Mr. TABER. If the gentleman will go into the question, he will find that until we started the C.W.A. proposition, except where that has made more difficult the problem of private employers who were trying to give employment, that has been a good thing.

Out of that $3,300,000,000 only $400,000,000, according to the information that is in the Budget, was allocated to the C.W.A. or to direct relief work which provided substantial employment. This means that, perhaps, one eighth of the total money that we threw into the pot last summer has been used for what we supposed it was going to be used—the purpose of relief—and most of the rest of it has been used for the promotion of pet projects.

Mr. ARNOLD. Does the gentleman mean to say that the building program, outside of the C.W.A. work, is not an employment program or a relief program?

Mr. TABER. I mean to say that very largely it is not providing sufficient employment from a relief standpoint to justify the amount that we are putting into it.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. SWICK. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from New York 5 additional minutes.

Mr. ARNOLD. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. ARNOLD. With the vast fund of knowledge at the gentleman's command, I think it would be very enlightening to the House and to the committee if he would outline to us just how he expects to handle this unemployment and relief program if he is not satisfied with the program that has been laid out under the $3,300,000,000 appropriation. I think constructive criticism from the gentleman would be helpful.

Mr. TABER. I may say to the gentleman that as a relief proposition most of these public buildings are not relief projects. They provide a very small amount of employment considering the amount of money they cost. I made an investigation with the information I could obtain from the Supervising Architect's Office 2 years ago, and I found it was costing $5,400 to put one man to work for a year in that work, and the other problems were somewhat similar. River and harbor projects at that time were costing $4,800 to put one man to work and public roads $3,600. It is now a little less, but the amount is very substantial. These things do not result in putting people to work the way they should be if we are operating this as a relief proposition.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Can the gentleman tell us about how much money has been expended on irrigation and reclamation projects?

Mr. TABER. Yes; substantially. Does the gentleman mean the entire amount during the history of the work?

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. No; I mean during the last year.

Mr. TABER. In this operation?

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Yes.

Mr. TABER. There was $51,000,000 allocated for immediate use in the 1934 operation, and that item includes, for the Bureau of Reclamation, $15,000,000, and for a lot of other items that go along with it, probably $4,000,000 or $5,000,000, that you would call irrigation. Then, for the next year, 1935, there is $60,000,000, and for the following year $22,550,000; that is, after July 1, 1935.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. What does the gentleman think of the policy of spending upward of $100,000,000 or more for reclamation and irrigation to bring more land into cultivation while we are spending several hundred million dollars to induce the farmers to withdraw lands from cultivation?

Mr. TABER. That is in line with the policy of the bureaucrats of pulling both ends against the middle until the middle gets "powerful" thin.

Mr. ARNOLD. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. TABER. Yes.

Mr. ARNOLD. I regret the gentleman has not answered to my satisfaction the question I propounded a few moments ago, or I think to the satisfaction of the Members here. It is very essential we have constructive criticism and not destructive criticism of these matters.

Now, if the gentleman can give to this House and the country another plan for taking care of the unemployment situation, and relieve unemployment throughout the country, I think here and now is the time to do it.

Mr. TABER. I am sorry that the gentleman from Illinois has not been listening to what I have said. I am going to call the gentleman's attention again to what I have said, and say it over again. Out of the $3,300,000,000 which has been made available, only $400,000,000 has been allotted to provide some sort of relief among the people. These other problems of employment do not yield much employment for many. The employment in the C.W.A., if the schedule is kept down to what it has been revised, would probably provide some employment to take care of the worthy. The other things do not take care of the worthy, but by tremendous Government expenditures have prevented the resurrection and revival of private industry.

I hope the people will follow along some line which will stop this tremendous expenditure, far and away beyond the purpose for which it was supposed to be used.

Mr. ARNOLD. The gentleman objects to the allotment of $400,000,000——

Mr. TABER. In proportion to the other allotments; yes.

Mr. ARNOLD. How much does the gentleman think should have been allotted?

Mr. TABER. I do not think two or three hundred million more would be excessive. This can be had by withdrawing allotments from unnecessary projects where the money is not to be spent before July 1, 1934.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman knows that in the 12 years of the Harding-Coolidge-Hoover regime hundreds of millions of dollars were expended for irrigation and reclamation. Why did not our friend from New York stop it?

Mr. TABER. We were stopping the expenditures for that purpose under Mr. Coolidge and Mr. Hoover.

Mr. PIERCE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. PIERCE. The gentleman said that $70,000,000 had been allotted for the Columbia River. I want to say that $20,000,000 was allotted for navigation and power and ultimately there may be irrigation there.

Mr. TABER. The total cost of that Columbia River irrigation project is estimated by the Bureau of Reclamation to be $115,000,000.

Mr. PIERCE. But not on the Columbia River.

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I should like to preface what I have to say by acquainting any of you who may not know with the names of my new colleagues on the naval subcommittee. On the minority side, Dr. SWICK, of Pennsylvania, and Mr. BUCKBEE, of Illinois, have been my collaborators, while on my own side I have had the assistance of Mr. CARY, of Kentucky, and Mr. HART, of Michigan. I consider myself fortunate, indeed, to have had such able, industrious, and genial coworkers.

Sixteen years have passed since my party completely sponsored a naval appropriation measure. Much has transpired in that space of time touching the Naval Establishment.

It was my privilege, back in 1918, as a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, then led by that great naval authority th elate Lemuel P. Padgett, of Tennessee, to have had a part in shaping that last measure.

We were then at war. Two years previously we had authorized the largest naval-construction program ever projected by any power. That program was in course of construction, though progress on the larger units had lagged owing to the imperative need to build destroyers and submarine chasers for combating enemy submarines.

The consummation of that program, which would have entailed some further authorization to give a proper balance between the several combatant units, would have placed our country foremost in naval strength among the maritime powers of the world.

We were committed then to a navy second to none.

Our great war-time President, Woodrow Wilson, in the course of a speech at St. Louis, Mo., on February 3, 1916, was the first Chief Executive to give public utterance to that long-cherished aspiration of the Naval General Board in these words:

> There is no other navy in the world that has to cover so great an area of defense as the American Navy, and it ought, in my judgment, to be incomparably the most adequate navy in the world.

I should like to appropriate them as an expression of my own views, then and now, and I should hope of all within the sound of my voice. Paraphrased, they find expression in the published United States naval policy in these words:

> To create, maintain, and operate a navy second to none and in conformity with treaty provisions.

If we were headed for naval supremacy well beyond a decade ago, what has transpired in the interim to reduce us, not to an equable status with the foremost naval power today, Great Britain, but all things considered, to a questionable second position in the ratings of naval powers? Let us see.

In the first place, there was convened in Washington on November 11, 1921, a conference on the limitation of naval armament. Out of that conference came a treaty between the United States, the British Empire, France, Italy, and Japan, halting the competitive construction of capital ships in the navies of such powers.

Times were hard then. Taxes were oppressive. The promise of lighter tax burdens dominated public sentiment and the treaty at the time may be said to have met with popular approval. I have never thought a clear understanding of its terms generally prevailed. It was widely believed at the time that the 5–5–3 ratio applied to all categories.

The treaty fixed our gross tonnage of capital ships, reducing us to parity with Great Britain and establishing a 5–3 ratio as to such units as between our own and the navy of Japan. It provided specifically for the replacement of allowed capital-ship tonnage. It also limited the unit and gross tonnage of aircraft carriers, establishing a 5–5–3 ratio as between the navies of Great Britain, the United States, and Japan, respectively. In lighter categories, while a maximum unit tonnage was established, the door was left wide open as to the number that might be built.

To adjust our capital-ship tonnage to the treaty-allowed strength, we were required to and did scrap vessels built and building roundly 840,000 tons.

That briefly explains the first phase of our relinquishment from the leadership that was within our grasp.

Now, the second phase: Following the Washington Conference, we immediately proceeded upon the theory of disarmament by example. That is to say, of not building to limits in restricted categories or keeping apace with the programs of cotreaty powers in categories unrestricted as to gross tonnage, in the hope that by such a course such powers would refrain from building, other than as they saw fit to replace over-age tonnage, and simply maintain proportionately the number of units within the several categories.

Mr. Chairman, disarmament by example has proved a dismal failure. Despite the proof thereof which we had abundantly prior to the second conference held in London, from which ensued the so-called "London Naval Treaty" concluded in April 1930, we continued to mark time, or relatively so, right down to the summer days last past.

Despite the need for lighter tax burdens, a nation can ill afford to gamble with its national defense. It is not prudent economy. It is not good statesmanship to neglect the Navy even when the international horizon is clear, and certainly not when storm clouds are brewing.

However, Mr. Chairman, that is the course that has been steered, and it is because of it that we find ourselves today, nearly 4 years since the conclusion of the London Treaty and 12 years since the conclusion of the Washington Treaty, in an inferior position in the ratings of naval powers.

What do the figures show? As of December 5, 1932, as to combatant vessels: (1) Laid down and completed, (2) building, and (3) appropriated for but not building, since the Washington conference, the unit totals were 36 for the United States, 113 for Great Britain, and 128 for Japan.

As of about the same date we were short of treaty strength in under-age tonnage, roundly, 240,000 tons, as against 63,000 tons for Great Britain. Japan, I am advised, has perfected plans to be completely current with the treaty maxima in the several categories, all under age, upon the expiration of the treaty in December 1936. That is an indication of what limitation by example has done for us.

Mr. Chairman, I am a firm believer in limitation; but I believe that when we enter into such a compact we should do so with the firm intention of attaining and maintaining the exact ratios fixed in the agreement, either completely or in the same measure as other treaty powers.

I have heard and you have heard the Washington Treaty severely condemned. Possibly the best arrangement it was practicable to conclude emanated from that conference. I have felt that our representatives could have written that treaty in terms that absolutely would have preserved to us complete parity with our British friends across the sea.

However, despite the sacrifices that it entailed, it did have its compensations, and, in my judgment, very large and momentous ones. The principle of noncompetitive building was the creature of that conference, and, for the first time, the principle of limitation was given recognition. My quarrel is not so much with the scrapping that immediately ensued but with the policy of inaction that later ensued.

Unfortunately, Mr. Chairman, the action of governments do not consistently represent the popular will. The course that has been pursued under the leadership of our Republican brethren no doubt was in harmony with the popular will throughout the countries of the world, but the popular will, in my judgment, has not dominated the naval policies of the governments of our cotreaty powers.

Instead, those governments have harkened to the urge of selfish interests; to false propaganda thus inspired. Why, even to the well-known English naval writer, Bywater, has been attributed the statement that the sole effect of naval treaties to date has been to emasculate the British Navy and to rejuvenate other fleets. Bywater is too well informed to write that sort of stuff. I have shown you—I have given you the figures of what Britain and Japan have done while we have sat by and watched. How absurd they make Bywater's alleged statement. Fellow Members, it was nothing but the rawest kind of propaganda for home consumption; and, judging by what has been done, I have no doubt that it is owing to just that sort of buncombe that the sorely oppressed peoples of other lands have been milched to build navies larger than necessary to maintain reduced treaty ratios.

It is unfortunate, my friends, that we must thus be influenced to vote larger outlays upon our naval arm, but equality with the best we must have, and I am confident we will have under the leadership of that splendid man who now occupies the office of President of these United States.

I am not what is generally referred to as a big-navy man. I am for the smallest, best Navy we can possibly get along with, but my yardstick is the best Navy elsewhere maintained. I believe we can do much to control that mode of measurement. I believe that the peoples of the world overwhelmingly are in favor of limitation. For economical reasons alone, when we meet in another naval conference in 1936, I do not believe that the spokesman of any nation will have the temerity sincerely to propose a return to the old order.

I sincerely hope and trust that out of that conference will come another treaty, equally as circumscribed as the London Treaty, but providing for decidedly less tonnage in the several categories, and if, perchance, capital ships as now defined are not to be completely eliminated, that such replacement units as may be agreed upon will be very materially reduced in tonnage and gun power.

Mr. Chairman, if the world knows that America is determined to live up to the letter and spirit of its own United States naval policy—to the letter and spirit of a Navy as envisioned by the immortal Wilson—these hopes, these aspirations, may not be in vain.

Under the leadership of President Roosevelt, we will sit at the next conference table with a full-treaty Navy, built and building. We may have some over-age tonnage in the destroyer category. We shall have replacement for much of it under way. In my judgment, in no other way may we look to continued limitation or to a reduction within the existing limitations.

Paradoxical as it may seem, although we are well on the road to a realization of treaty strength at this particular moment, the appropriation bill that I am presenting calls for a smaller appropriation than has been provided at any time since the Washington conference in 1922. Of course, the explanation is that in consequence of the authority contained in the National Industrial Recovery Act, the construction has been undertaken of 32 naval vessels under an allotment of $238,000,000 of the appropriation authorized by that act.

These 32 vessels, plus the 22 vessels under way out of regular appropriations, will bring us current with treaty limitations in all combatant categories, completely ignoring tonnage that is classed as over-age, except one 8-inch gun cruiser, which may not be commenced under the terms of the London Treaty prior to January 1, 1935 (the middle of the next fiscal year), and three 6-inch gun cruisers of 10,000 tons each.

The Budget includes $400,000 for commencing the last 8-inch gun cruiser. Our bill goes further and includes $1,200,000 for commencing the three 6-inch gun cruisers, so that once more we find ourselves approaching a proper balance in the international naval scales.

Of course, practically every destroyer we have today, not building, technically is over-age, but I rather think provision soon will have been made for their replacement as well as other construction of a replacement character. We have 10 light cruisers approaching the age limit; and our submarines, in various tonnage increments, will be reaching the age limit commencing in the calendar year 1935. Over-age units of 3,000 tons or less may be laid down 2 years before such class of vessels actually become over-age.

Mr. Chairman, before turning to other phases of the pending measure, perhaps I should give a summation as regards the funds that the bill proposes shall be made available, contrasting them with the available funds the present year.

For the current fiscal year, including all appropriations, reappropriations, diverted funds, and unexpended balances, but excluding the so-called "permanent annual and indefinite appropriations", which occur automatically, the Department has available for obligation a total of $347,431,837.

For next year, upon the basis of the bill we are presenting, it will have available for obligation approximately $314,000,000.

Of the amount currently available, owing to impoundments in consequence of economy legislation, such as nonfilling of vacancies, automatic increases in compensation, and the pay cut—in fact, the pay cut very largely—$22,150,285 will not be expended, and owing to administratively imposed economies $46,270,052 will not be expended.

Of the amount that will be available next year, it is not expected at this time that more than $310,000,000 will be expended.

So, looking at the current and projected naval Budgets from the expenditure standpoint, the comparison is $279,011,500 for 1934 with $310,000,000 roundly for 1935.

Our bill is $1,585,148 less than the Budget total, so under our bill the 1935 cash expenditures will be a portion of that reduction under the Budget program of $310,000,000.

The Bureau of the Budget has placed currently-available funds, and is expected to do likewise as to projected-available funds, upon a cash-withdrawal basis. That applies to the entire Federal service. Therefore, the appropriations we are called upon to make present the actual amount of cash that will be needed within the confines of the fiscal year 1935 to operate the several spending agencies of the Federal Government. I personally feel that the cash-withdrawal system is logical and sound and that under a well-organized Budget system is at all times quite necessary.

On page 3 of the report on the bill I have attempted to set out the principal factors contributing to the amount by which cash withdrawals during 1935, under the Budget, are expected to exceed the cash withdrawals during 1934. I shall not take the time to repeat them here.

Now, reverting to the bill, divorced from such things as carry-overs, indirect appropriations, and cash withdrawals; in other words, merely the direct appropriations which only enter into the total of a purely appropriational statement, our proposals call for a total of $284,747,244 against the Budget total of $286,332,392, or a reduction, and it is a net reduction, of $1,585,148.

In the firse place, let me say that only in a few isolated cases do the estimates as to individual appropriations exceed the current appropriations. Generally speaking, where that occurs, the increase is practically negligible.

The estimates, contrasted with the current appropriations as reduced by reason of legislative and administrative action, represent quite a substantial advance, which results from a general liberalization in the current year policy, by which practically all appropriations were in effect reduced by the imposition administratively of obligation limitations, and, among others, to the factors to which I have already referred on page 3 of the report.

Now, if you will turn to page 5 of the report you will find a complete exposition commencing thereon of our action upon the Budget estimates touching money phases.

I shall not attempt to discuss them all. Some of them need no further explanation. Some of them, however, I feel that I should enlarge upon.

In the list there are six items all related. They total $376,697.

The Department closed the Great Lakes Training Station this year as a measure of economy. The San Diego station is now doing all of the recruit training. The Norfolk station is in a stand-by status, ready to resume on short notice. The Norport Training Station also has been closed.

The number of first enlistments are now exceeding last year's estimate, and the Department looks for a larger number next year. So much so that San Diego's capacity alone (2,100) will not be sufficient to accommodate them. Norfolk, with a capacity of 1,342, and San Diego, of course, could without any difficulty. However, we should not lose sight of some of the harmful consequences resulting from dispensing with the interior training station at Great Lakes.

This training station was established in 1904. Up to this fiscal year it has been continuously operated. It is the only Naval Establishment in the interior of the country. It affords the only naval contact for a very considerable portion of our citizenry far from either seaboard. Its discontinuance would not only interfere with the continuance of the long-established policy of endeavoring to maintain a nationally representative enlisted organization, but it would also upset the practice or create discrimination in the practice of permitting recruits to visit their homes, at their own expense, upon conclusion of their training and prior to being sent to sea. This practice has been responsible for fewer desertions and, therefore, has saved an indeterminate amount of money and, obviously, has contributed to improved morale and greater efficiency.

The naval subcommittee considered the matter very carefully. We took up the question directly with the Secretary of the Navy. The Secretary's position is that the station should remain closed for reasons of economy. We do not propose to compel him to do something against his judgment, but we question the wisdom of keeping Great Lakes closed and we simply are making it possible for the Department to reopen it, if, upon further reflection, it should decide to pursue that course.

Aside from the considerations I have stated, we have an investment out there of roundly $26,000,000. For the upkeep of this investment the Budget includes $25,818. For less than 1½ percent of the investment the station may be reopened, appropriately maintained, and resume the training of recruits.

Then you will see an item showing an increase under the Naval Reserve of $183,518.

The appropriation for this component for the current year is $3,346,960. In consequence of legislation and administrative action but $2,064,509 of this sum may be obligated. The reduction is being met by decreasing the number of officers and men on active duty, the number of pay drills from 48 to 24—none for the Marine Corps Reserve—by eliminating training for student aviation pilots and for aviation officers of the volunteer branch, and by reducing the number of flying hours from 45 to 30.

For 1935 the Budget includes $2,561,991, which, while under the current appropriation, is roundly $500,000 in excess of the amount which may be obligated the present fiscal year.

The estimate contemplates 36 pay drills for the Naval and Marine Corps Reserve, the same as for the National Guard, and some slight expansion in Reserve aviation expenditures, although holding to 30 hours' flying time for aviation officers.

There seems to be a unanimity of judgment among regular naval aviation officers, including the Chief of the Bureau of Aeronautics, that 30 hours are entirely inadequate, and recommendation has been made by such official and other officers that provision be made for not less than 45 hours. The committee, concurring in that view, has made provision for 45 hours of flying time and for giving training to 280, instead of 250, Naval Reserve aviators; and 80, instead of 40, Marine Corps Reserve aviators, which has occasioned the addition of $183,518 to the Naval Reserve appropriation and $5,739 to the Marine Corps Reserve appropriation. The larger numbers are the numbers who will be eligible to receive aviation training. Providing for a lesser number would result in spreading the increase in the number of flying hours over all, and thereby defeat what is sought to be accomplished, namely, to give these men training adequate for the maintenance of their military flying efficiency. Otherwise the money would be wasted.

I might say, further, that there is considerable agitation, apparently fostered by the Naval Reserve Officers' Association, to increase the number of drills to 48. As I said before, the Budget is based upon 36 drills for all civil components, naval and military. We have held to 36, assuming that the House would be guided by the Budget recommendations.

Still referring to the table commencing on page 5 of the report, we approach a series of reductions.

The first grows out of the refusal of the committee and the House, in connection with the independent offices appropriation bill, to reinstate automatic promotions for the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps.

The Budget included $2,673,327 for the Navy and $299,130 for the Marine Corps, looking to the restoration of automatic promotions. As the independent offices bill passed the House it provided for no automatic promotions throughout the Federal service; but it did provide that officers of the commissioned services embraced by the joint pay act of 1922, upon advancement in rank, should receive the pay prescribed for such rank by such pay act, continuing the freeze, however, as to base pay within a rank and the triennial 5-percent automatic increases, commonly called "fogies."

The amendment occasioned an added expense of $946,584 for the Navy and $48,038 for the Marine Corps but permits a reduction for the phases denied of $1,726,743 from the Navy estimates and $251,092 from the Marine Corps estimates.

Next comes flying pay, which has been a bone of contention for a number of years.

Members will recall that section 10 of the independent offices appropriation act, fiscal year 1934, vested in the President authority to suspend the extra pay or reduce the rate of extra pay allowed to flying personnel while on flying duty, and to distinguish between degrees of hazard in various types of flying duty and make different rates of extra pay applicable thereto. Up to this time no change has been ordered by the Chief Executive in consequence of such authorization. The committee has concluded, therefore, to provide the funds to pay the number of recipients contemplated by the current appropriations, both for the Navy and Marine Corps—$1,170,297 and $141,306, respectively. Unless some adjustment downward is made by the President some of the personnel now drawing flying pay, listed on pages 252–255 of the hearings as to the Navy, will need to have their flying orders revoked in order that the limitations will be adequate to take care of the appropriate number of student aviators and new officer graduates of the flying school.

Flying pay for enlisted men is the next item and the reduction results from holding to the present year number—1,682. The Department wanted to raise the number to 1,746.

The next item, touching the pay of medical officers, I probably should enlarge upon.

When Veterans' Administration patients were evacuated from naval hospitals the Navy was left with considerable personnel that had been commissioned or enlisted solely because of the demands of such patients. This situation later became further aggravated by the contraction of certain naval activities. Then came the demand of the Civilian Conservation Corps for medical personnel, and surplus medical officers were assigned to that activity, which assumed the cost of their pay and allowances. On the 4th of January 1934, 200 naval medical officers were so employed. Other classes of medical personnel rendered surplus by the action with respect to veterans have been or will be eliminated either through resignation, retirement, expiration of enlistment, or transfer to other ratings. Of the 200 officers now on detail, the Navy has a present need for 57. If the Coast Guard should become a naval corps, it is estimated that 79 of the remaining 143 will be needed to care for Coast Guard personnel. That would leave a surplus of 64, and for this number the committee is providing furlough or one-half pay, permitting a reduction in the pay estimate of $175,765. The Budget carries funds for the full pay and allowances of the entire number.

The reduction on account of clothing outfits is self-explanatory. The number of new recruits very largely is a guess. There were 7,061 in 1932 and 4,572 in 1933. It is true that the rate of reenlistments lately has begun to decline. Pay cuts, taking away reenlistment gratuities, and the suspension of automatic promotions very probably are reflected in the increase.

The pay of enlisted men also was cut 15 percent this year. Previously they had been exempted. Then, according to their rating, normally they receive a cash gratuity of either $50 or $25 for each year of their last expiring enlistment. That has been taken away. In addition, under the pay law they received an increase of 5 percent of their base pay for each 4 years, but not to exceed a total of 25 percent. That has been frozen as of June 30, 1932. I have never been in sympathy with economizing at the expense of the enlisted personnel; certainly not of those in the lower pay brackets. I think that course was and is a very great mistake.

Running down through the remaining items on page 6 of the report, I see no occasion to burden you at this time with any further explanation. I have already spoken of the amount we have added for commencing three 6-inch-gun cruisers, and in speaking of new ship construction I referred to the large program now under way out of an allotment made to the Navy Department by the Public Works Administration.

The Department has received other allotments from that source, and I feel that I should not close without drawing them to your attention.

To date, according to my information, all such allotments total $274,765,924. You will find a statement on page 4 of the report of the several allotments and the general purposes. Passing over the first item in that statement, to which I have already referred, the next five all relate to what we usually speak of as public-work projects. They total $25,917,527, divided $7,702,935 for reconditioning work and $18,214,552 for new construction. Every item contributing to the total is listed in the hearings commencing on page 496.

The aviation allotment, the last in the table, will be used in this way:

Navigational equipment	$213,250
Radio equipment	457,759
Maintenance, repair and operation, stations and aircraft	714,600
New aircraft completely equipped	6,114,391

In view of the fact that something has been said here about the N.R.A. I shall refer to that matter at this time; and, in referring to the several allotments generally, it is questionable, in my judgment, if any better way existed for complying with the spirit of the National Industrial Recovery Act of getting money into the hands of wage earners in return for valuable and useful services rendered, both from the standpoints of promptness and ratio of labor to material and either by contract or navy yard or station labor. Approximately 85 percent of appropriations for the construction of ships, it has been calculated, goes to the payment of salaries and wages in producing and fabricating raw materials gathered practically in every State of the Union. Approximately 73 percent of the pending naval budget goes directly into salaries and wages. Considering the labor incident to the several stages of putting materials into the yards for fabrication, finishing, construction, or installation, it is easy to see how the 85-percent figure may be about the general average.

The committee has given consideration to the details of the several allotments embraced by the table on page 4 of the report. In no instance did it find a purpose that needed authorization, or further authorization, or a purpose for which an appropriation previously had been refused. Of course, all of the projected expenditures apply to objects, the Budget approving, for which the Congress sooner or later would have been called upon to appropriate. Whether or not it would make the appropriations or in as great or lesser measure would be mere conjecture. Suffice to say, it would seem that the Navy was ready to go forward with projects in conformity with the spirit of the National Industrial Recovery Act and in directions that will materially promote its efficiency and effectiveness.

May I express the hope that those of you who were not present at the time will read the able speech delivered in the House on February 22, 1932, by the distinguished Chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, the Honorable CARL VINSON. It leaves no doubts as to the efficacy of naval building for creating a maximum of employment reaching into every corner of the country.

Before concluding, Mr. Chairman, there is one other matter I wish to dwell upon for a moment.

We are rapidly approaching full treaty strength. I think unquestionably we will reach that status as rapidly as the President may be able to accomplish it consistent generally with the public interest. With that in mind, I call your attention to my observation expressed to the Secretary of the Navy, commencing on page 651 of the hearings, with respect to the cost of maintaining a treaty navy. We must not lose sight of that factor. There is no use building ships if we are not going decently to maintain them and adequately man them. The total annual maintenance cost we can do much to control. We must resist adding expenses not of an essential character, however, or by whomsoever urged, and we must search out and eliminate existing expenses that may be dispensed with without detracting from the efficiency and effectiveness of the Naval Establishment.

My hope is that before we shall be called upon to provide for the maintenance of a full-treaty navy the nations of the world will have solemnly covenanted to continue complete limitation of naval armament, substantially reduced in all of the several categories.

The peace and happiness and prosperity of mankind depend very largely upon such a course.

I thank you. [Applause.]

Mr. SWICK. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SHOEMAKER].

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Mr. Chairman, I come before you this morning to call attention once more to a usurpation of power at the hands of a Federal judge. It so happens that in the State of Minnesota our banking situation is tied up with the same nefarious group, namely, the Chase National Bank of New York, the Wiggins gang, and for the past several years they have been organizing chain banks throughout the State of Minnesota. They had quite an organization orgy there in which they mulcted the people out of hundreds of millions of dollars. Their stocks were selling for several hundred dollars a share and those stocks have now come down to five or six dollars a share. Widows and orphans were asked to take the money they had on deposit by the presidents of these banks, especially by E. W. Decker. I put heat enough under him in the last 2 months so that he resigned as president of this bank. He is the man who secretly connived with Mr. Wiggins, of New York, of the Chase National, to defraud the people of the State of Minnesota out of thousands and millions of dollars. The State of Minnesota, through an executive order of the Governor, demanded an investigation of their method of selling stock. Their stock is worth from six to seven dollars a share on the market at the present time. The State Commerce Commission of the State of Minnesota was authorized to proceed with this investigation, which they started. The money was appropriated under the blue-sky laws of the State of Minnesota to make the investigation, and this last week, this group of highbinders and racketeers, international and local crooks, headed by E. W. Decker, the Northwest Bank Corporation, and the First National Corporation of St. Paul, went to a Federal judge, Judge Molyneaux, and got out a restraining order, restraining the State of Minnesota from proceeding in any manner against these organizations, either criminally or civilly, making it a sweeping mandate of hands off. In other words, this Federal judge has stepped in and assumed the position of dictator and is denying the right to the State of Minnesota to bring to the bar of justice these criminals for their criminal acts in the State of Minnesota.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Yes.

Mr. WOODRUFF. What has the State of Minnesota done in view of the action of this Federal judge?

Mr. SHOEMAKER. I am coming right now to that, because of requests from the State of Minnesota, if you please. There is only one thing which the State of Minnesota can do, and that is to appeal to Congress to take the power away from some of these judicial despots who have been wrecking our Government and absolutely reducing the opinion of our American court system to zero, and the only voice that the State of Minnesota has here is the voice of its Representatives in Congress. The only solution to this proposition is in the House of Representatives, if you please.

Mr. WOODRUFF. I am very glad that the gentleman is giving the House the facts that he is today. May I call his attention to one thing that occurred in the State of Michigan: When the Federal Radio Commission denied the right of that great State to install a radio system for the use of the police of the State, do you know what Governor Green, of the State of Michigan, did? He installed the radio system without regard to the law or wish of the Federal authorities; the larger cities in the State followed suit; other States did the same thing; until today practically every State is able, through its radio, to communicate with its law-enforcing agents almost instantly, wherever they may be. Criminals are apprehended, and punished, who, under conditions existing prior to the installation of the police radio, would go unpunished. The courageous action of that Michigan Governor was a very decided contribution to law enforcement in this country. Had Federal authority had its way, this contribution would not have been made. There are certain rights in this country that inherently belong to the State, and if this Federal judge is guilty of what you outline here, he has gone far beyond the right or power of any Federal judge; he has denied the right of a State to throw the mantle of protection around its citizens. The gentleman from Minnesota is to be congratulated upon presenting these facts to the House.

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Mr. Chairman, I am glad to hear that, and I am glad to hear that the Governor of the State of Michigan had the manhood to go ahead. The people of the State of Minnesota have a right to be protected, and the Constitution of the State of Minnesota provides that they shall be protected against criminals of whatever nature.

I think the time has come when we may as well do something here in Congress, and do something at once, to show these despots, these representatives of big business, and this judge particularly, who has been the tool and puppet of the Power Trust and the Railroad Trust and the milling interests and the big business organizations in Minnesota in general a number of years, that they have gone too far. We have two judges of that kind in Minnesota. The other is John H. Sanborn, and I shall take care of his case later.

Mr. Chairman, I do not think there is anything more that is necessary for me to state at this time in respect to this matter. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by the insertion of some telegrams and letters between the attorney general of the State of Minnesota and others as well as myself and also of a resolution which I shall introduce today.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to follows:

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., January 18, 1934.

F. H. SHOEMAKER,
1005 House Office Building, Washington, D.C.:

Judge Molyneaux signed order today restraining Minnesota Commerce Commission from proceeding with investigation of Northwest Bancorporation. Commission also is restrained from starting any action, civil or criminal. Suggest you demand a Federal investigation Bancorporation affair and acts of Judge Molyneaux interfering with sovereign powers of Minnesota.

F. T. WOLF.

NOVEMBER 30, 1933.

Hon. H. H. PETERSON,
Attorney General Minnesota, St. Paul, Minn.:

Please wire immediately Senator FLETCHER, Chairman Subcommittee on Banking and Currency, demanding investigation of Northwest Bancorporation and First National Corporation. Your support in my efforts will be appreciated and a great help toward eliminating like conditions in the future throughout the Northwest.

F. H. SHOEMAKER,
Member of Congress.

THE STATE OF MINNESOTA,
OFFICE OF ATTORNEY GENERAL,
St. Paul, December 1, 1933.

Hon. F. H. SHOEMAKER,
Member of Congress, Washington, D.C.

DEAR FRANCIS: In answer to your telegram of Saturday, I beg to advise you that today the Commerce Commission of the State of Minnesota started an investigation of the Northwest Bancorporation and the First National Corporation pursuant to instructions issued by the Governor a couple of weeks ago. I presume that you were aware of this fact.

I should like to know why you want me to make a request upon Senator FLETCHER, Chairman of the Subcommittee on Banking and Currency, demanding an investigation of the Northwest Bancorporation and the First National Corporation in view of the pending investigation before the Minnesota Commerce Commission.

If you will advise me as to the facts that make this desirable at this time I will be very glad to join in your request. I think that I should be in possession of information that will enable me to back up the action which I take, because undoubtedly I will be asked to explain why I have joined in such a request.

With best wishes and sincere regards, I am,

Yours very truly,

HARRY H. PETERSON,
Attorney General.

DECEMBER 4, 1933.

Hon. HARRY H. PETERSON,
Attorney General, St. Paul, Minn.

DEAR MR. PETERSON: Referring to your letter of December 4, addressed to Congressman SHOEMAKER in connection with the investigation of the Northwest Bancorporation and the First National Corporation.

Mr. SHOEMAKER is now in Panama and will not be back until the first of the year. Having discussed the subject with Mr. SHOEMAKER, I take the liberty of submitting what we consider not only substantial but vital reasons why an investigation of the Northwest Bancorporation and the First National Corporation should be by Federal rather than by Minnesota authority.

The Northwest Bancorporation is organized under the laws of Delaware. It has 139 affiliated institutions, serves 115 distinct communities, and operates in 8 different States; namely, Minnesota, North Dakota, South Dakota, Iowa, Montana, Nebraska, Washington, and Wisconsin. It has been shown by Federal investigations already made that there has been a close connection between Wiggins, deposed and discredited president of the Chase National Bank, and Mr. E. W. Decker, president of the Northwest Bancorporation, Northwestern National Bank, and Minnesota Loan & Trust Co. The tentacles of this huge corporation reach over such a vast territory that it is beyond the limited power of a single State to show the danger lurking in interlocking directorates. You, of course, realize that Minnesota has no power to subpena a witness beyond its own territorial limits, and any attempts to develop real testimony from without the State can be easily evaded.

We are of the opinion, therefore, that a State investigation would be a mere gesture without power of enforcement and would prove little but the futility of the effort. Whereas a Federal investigation has full power behind it to cover all interstate matters. A trained set of investigators are now employed by the Senate committee which is now in action and stripped for battle. A Senate investigation would receive national publicity which the State investigation would not receive, and if the State investigation should fail by reason of lack of enforcement powers, it would do more harm than good.

There is a nigger in the woodpile, and we suggest that the effort should be made by those in authority in Minnesota to enlist the other seven States interested; to join in a demand on the Senate committee through its chairman, Senator FLETCHER, to hold a speedy senatorial inquest which will be thorough and help to loosen the choking grip the Northwest is struggling under.

Yours very truly,

F. H. SHOEMAKER,
By OWEN M. LAMB,
Secretary.

House Resolution 233

F. H. SHOEMAKER submitted the following resolution, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary is authorized and directed, as a whole or by subcommittee, to inquire into and investigate the official conduct of Joseph W. Molyneaux, a district judge for the United States District Court for the District of Minnesota, to determine whether in the opinion of said committee he has been guilty of any high crime or misdemeanor which in the contemplation of the Constitution requires the interposition of the constitutional powers of the House. Said committee shall report its findings to the House, together with such resolutions of impeachment or other recommendation as it seems proper.

SEC. 2. For the purposes of this resolution the committee is authorized to sit and act during the present Congress at such times and places in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, whether or not the House is sitting, has recessed, or has adjourned, to hold such hearing, to require the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, and to take such testimony as it deems necessary.

Mr. CARY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. VINSON].

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I feel that the House is exceedingly fortunate in having in charge of naval budget matters my distinguished colleague, the Honorable WILLIAM A. AYRES, of Kansas.

Like myself, he has consistently stood for a Navy in accordance with our United States naval policy, but ever watchful to see that the cost is confined to absolute essentials and held to the lowest figure consistent with economy and efficiency.

The bill that he has presented to the House today, like similar measures he has presented in former years, well demonstrates his sound judgment touching naval matters.

I have examined his bill and I have read rather thoroughly his hearings and report, and I propose to give my support to his bill in all its various phases.

It calls for a total of $284,747,244 of direct appropriations, as against $308,669,562 for the current fiscal year. However, at this time it is not my purpose to speak to you with reference to the various provisions of the naval appropriation bill but to call to your attention the general condition and needs of the Navy.

Mr. Chairman, the fundamental naval policy of the United States, which has been affirmed for many years is, "To maintain the Navy in sufficient strength to support the national policies and commerce and to guard the continental and overseas possessions of the United States." Please note clearly that the protection against invasion of our continental territory is only one of the obligations which has been placed on our first line of defense. It may well be that the protection of outlying possessions and the support of our policies and commerce will prove the more difficult parts of the task.

It is important to recognize that, for it will help to clear away the statement which is made so frequently that the United States needs a navy for defense only; that is, for the defense of the coasts. It is to be hoped that the United States will never engage in war except for the defense of her rights, her obligations, or her essential interests. In that sense, our policy is purely defensive but, since we have vast interests beyond the seas, it follows that the Navy cannot be limited to coast defense. And it must be added as a military axiom that war, however defensive in moral character, must be waged aggressively if we are to hope for success.

For national security, it is not sufficient to have the will to enforce a principle which is firmly held and avowed. There must be a clear expression of national purpose accompanied by evident and sufficient means to carry it into effect. Provided the policy is maintained with a courteous consideration of the rights and susceptibilities of other nations, this will afford the surest safeguard against war. On the other hand, no condition is more hazardous than the existence of the dormant popular feeling which may be fanned to fever heat by a moment of great passions but behind which lies no organized power for action.

At the end of the World War the United States was about to become the dominant naval power of the world. When the Washington Conference assembled in the fall of 1921, we possessed a naval force, built and building, which was stronger than that of any other power. This had been created in accordance with our announced policy to maintain a navy second to none, which policy came into being because of the fact that during the World War we were unable to maintain neutrality and did not have the power to compel it. We felt deeply that our interest demanded this protection and it was obvious that the wealth and industrial resources of the United States made it possible for us to provide it.

No doubt, every Member of this House remembers the result of that conference. As an altruistic contribution to world peace, we took the unprecedented course of surrendering voluntarily the naval supremacy which we then possessed. We agreed to scrap 11 of the most powerful battleships and battle cruisers which have ever been designed. They were then approaching completion and had cost $94,757,000. When finished they would have aggregated 465,800 tons. In addition, we agreed to scrap 20 completed battleships. Further, we agreed not to increase the strength of our naval bases or fortifications in the Pacific, except on the coasts of the United States, Alaska, the Aleutian Islands, Hawaii, and the Canal Zone, and not to establish new bases or fortifications in insular possessions which we then held or might acquire. In doing all this, we had announced to the world, in the most unmistakable terms, that we were willing to forego supremacy and that we would be content with strength equal to that of Great Britain but measurably greater than that of any other power.

No other country made a contribution to the cause of disarmament which can even be mentioned in the same breath. Not only did we give up much more at that time than did any of the others, but, in addition, in the following years we were very slow to build anything else, whereas each of the other great navies was built up very actively in the classes which had been left unlimited. Within the space of 10 years, Great Britain provided for 134 new combatant ships, Japan 130, France 166, and Italy 115. By contrast, the United States provided for but 34. This culminated in the 4 years of the Hoover administration during which not one new ship was authorized for the United States Navy.

At the Geneva Conference of 1927 and at the London Conference of 1930 we were not in a position to make a similar sacrifice again and none of the others was willing to do so. Geneva was a complete failure and London arranged for no scrapping except that the disposal of a small number of the older battleships, which had been agreed upon at Washington, was somewhat expedited. There was, however, an agreement to limit the strength in each category which previously had been unrestricted but the percentage allotted to Japan in the lighter vessels was appreciably higher than that granted to them in capital ships and aircraft carriers at Washington. Since then Japan has made it clear that she is dissatisfied with any limitation below the strength permitted the United States and Great Britain, and it seems likely that she will refuse to continue the present ratios after the end of 1936, when the current agreement expires.

At the time of the conference, the belief throughout our country was that the ratio of 5-5-3 having been fixed, we would continue to maintain our Navy substantially at the specified level. Without doing so, it would be impossible either to guard our interests or to discharge our responsibilities. Instead of maintaining parity with Great Britain and a superiority over each of the other powers, we have let our strength in the lighter categories, that is, in the light cruisers, destroyers, and submarines, slip to fifth place and a very poor fifth at that!

When President Roosevelt entered the White House our prospective shortage, on the date that the treaty is to expire, amounted to the staggering total of 135 ships. To attempt to make up this great deficiency in the short time of less than 4 years then remaining was beyond the realm of possibility. However, a start could be made. The National Industrial Recovery Act authorized the President to undertake the construction of naval vessels and aircraft required therefor within the terms and limits of the London Treaty. Six weeks after this act had been approved and in accordance with its provisions, contracts were awarded for the construction of 32 ships of 120,600 tons. Besides these, in accordance with previous authorization and appropriation acts, contracts were let for 5 ships aggregating 17,400 tons.

The 37 ships so contracted for are the following:

		Tons
1	10,000-ton cruiser with 8-inch guns	10,000
4	10,000-ton cruisers with 6-inch guns	40,000
2	20,000-ton aircraft carriers	40,000
8	1,850-ton destroyers	14,800
16	1,500-ton destroyers	24,000
4	1,300-ton submarines	5,200
2	2,000-ton gunboats	4,000
37		138,000

Every single one of these vessels is desperately needed by the Navy. However, to provide against the remote possibility that the United States might enter into an international agreement for the further limitation of armament, the President is authorized by the National Industrial Recovery Act to suspend, in whole or in part, any naval construction undertaken under the provision of this act. A conference to consider naval armaments is scheduled to meet in 1935, but it is a fact that the United States is so far short of the limits provided by the London Treaty that it is utterly inconceivable that the navies of the world will be reduced to a point which would make any part of our new construction unnecessary. The Geneva Conference of 1927 and the London Conference of 1930 made it perfectly clear that no other nation is willing to scrap ships as we did by the Washington Treaty in order to reduce its strength to that of the United States.

The primary purpose in building warships is to provide means for protecting our interests and for supporting our policies. In addition to this, however, the effect of shipbuilding as a stimulus to industry cannot be overemphasized. In the first place, the recent contracts assured employment for many thousands of skilled artisans, whose special training and abilities are essential to our continuance as a seafaring nation. Until August 1933 it had seemed certain that they would be forced into the ranks of the unemployed. In the second place, the building of a ship is a truly national undertaking, to which every State of the Union contributes a share. Steel, lumber, paint, machinery, electrical equipment, metal fittings, furniture, and so forth, come from widely separated sources and in great quantities. The assembly and transportation of these materials provide occupation for additional thousands, with the accompanying circulation of wealth, which recently has been so badly out of adjustment.

Then, when she is completed, each ship will require great quantities of fuel, food, ammunition, and other supplies of many kinds. Almost all these come from domestic sources, even when the ship is cruising in foreign waters. As an example, when the fleet made a goodwill cruise to Australia and New Zealand in the summer of 1925, the entire force of 25,000 men was entirely subsisted, fueled, and supplied from home ports for a period of 5 months, an undertaking which many had previously considered entirely impracticable.

In view of our inability to make up our great deficiency in under-age tonnage prior to the end of the London Treaty, it becomes necessary to extend the life of our present ships by making such repairs and alterations as may be necessary to keep them in a satisfactory material condition. Of course, it must be recognized that no amount of modernization can make an old ship equal to a new one. The art of designing and building has advanced so rapidly that that is not possible. Furthermore, the cost is high for the results achieved. It can be justified only on the ground that it is the best way out of a bad situation. We are unable to replace all the over-age units now, partly because of the excessive drain on the Treasury in a short time and partly because of the lack of sufficient shipbuilding capacity and finally because it is very important to spread out the program so as to make it as nearly uniform as possible. A steady work load is essential to economical construction as well as to the best design.

It is a fact, too, that any appreciable variation in the rate of building is apt to bring accusations that we are starting an armaments race. Nothing is further from our minds and there is no justice in the charge. It is but necessary to point out how very short we are of treaty limits and how very slow we were to build cruisers and destroyers and submarines after the larger categories had been limited, whereas Great Britain, Japan, France, and Italy strained every nerve to increase their strength. In spite of these facts, however, the announcement of our intention to commence part of the long-deferred building brought many allegations both from foreign sources and from some misguided Americans that this would be an unfriendly act and that it would compel corresponding action abroad. Such statements are absurd and they collapse as soon as the facts are known, but you may expect similar propaganda whenever we attempt to correct weaknesses which have been allowed to develop in a period of laxity.

Approximately 3 years will be required to complete the vessels which are now building. As the time approaches for the launching of each, we must be ready to lay down another so that the objective of a steady continuous program can be attained. We must break away from the old hit-or-miss system with alternating periods of intense activity and complete idleness with which we have been plagued in the past. Feast is almost as undesirable as famine. By holding to a steady work load, our ships will be cheaper and vastly better. They will be better designed and better built. I urge that the United States adopt now a fixed policy of building its Navy substantially to the limit in each category which has been or may be prescribed by international agreement. This objective could be attained, without any unusual effort by the year 1939. When that objective has been attained, steady replacement of over-age ships should be provided for so that at all times we will have a Navy which is equal to its responsibilities. In this way, the welfare and security of our country will depend upon ourselves and not upon the generosity of any foreign power.

Most of you realize probably that a fleet is a very complex organization. No one type of vessel or weapon, in whatever numbers or of whatever excellence, is able to assume the entire burden of guarding our interests in the event of hostilities. Each has its special function which no other can discharge so well. Each has certain limitations which might prove fatal unless that blind spot were protected by the appropriate means. Yet we have insistent propaganda by some enthusiasts that our entire reliance be placed on one type, to the exclusion of all others. At one time it was fire ships, at another frigates, later on torpedo boats, to be followed in turn by submarines, and finally by aircraft. Still another school of thought insists that we abandon all else and entrust our homes and our loved ones solely to the protection afforded by a sense of our own altruism and righteousness.

Not at all! I maintain that our sure shield is an active, well-trained, fully manned fleet; made up of all types in the proper proportion. It is unnecessary to provide any one kind of equipment to excess, but we are faced with grave danger when one or more are allowed to become deficient.

What the proper proportion is may vary from time to time and is determined by many technical considerations, including our geographical situation and the strength of possible opponents. We must, of course, and we have every intention to adhere strictly to the limitations which are set by treaty. However, we have learned to our sorrow that a high-minded, self-sacrificing contribution to disarmament cannot be expected to influence any other nation to take a similar course. Consequently, we are forced to bring our strength in the several categories substantially to the level which has been agreed upon. In doing this, we cannot be justly accused of participating in an armament race or of planning to attack a neighbor. We are a peaceful people and would much prefer never to be drawn into war. At the same time one cannot fail to take note of the tense situation that exists throughout the world, and it would be foolhardy in the extreme not to make reasonable preparations against possible eventualities. Never was the maxim—"Trust in God but keep your powder dry", more apt than at the present.

A navy, to be of any use in times of emergency, must be maintained throughout the intervening times of peace. However patriotic our citizens or whatever effort they may be prepared to make, their exertions will be largely ineffective if they are delayed until the last minute. Even with unlimited money, the building of a ship requires a long time and a very expert organization. Then, when she has been completed, another long period of intensive training of her crew is required before she can be considered ready to take her place in the battle line. During the World War the United States suspended all other building for the Navy in a superhuman effort to turn out destroyers with which to fight the U-boats. A hundred and seventy-one of this type were laid down, but only 38 of them were completed and only 27 reached the war zone prior to the armistice. And a destroyer is a small ship which can be built more quickly than any other type. In general, it may be accepted as true that a naval war must be fought with the vessels on hand at the outbreak of hostilities. Woe betide that nation which delays its preparation until the hour of need!

By the London Treaty the United States, Great Britain, and Japan agreed not to lay down any replacement battleships until after 1936. In 8-inch-gun cruisers, we are allowed 18, of which the seventeenth will be commenced in 1934 and the eighteenth can be started in 1935. In the 6-inch-gun cruiser category, however, we will be 33,000 tons short of our allowance, even after the four 10,000-ton units recently contracted for have been built. This shortage is important and must not be forgotten.

In the air our Navy has been a pioneer. Perhaps we have gone farther in that field than any other power. Certainly there is throughout the Navy a very thorough realization of the importance of fleet aviation. All concerned are determined to maintain and to develop this arm. Until now the great need has been for additional aircraft carriers. Under the Washington Treaty we are allowed 135,000 tons of carriers. We have completed 2 of 33,000 tons each and 1 experimental carrier of 11,500 tons, which may be replaced at any time, and we are building 3 which will aggregate 53,800 tons. The first of these, the Ranger, which will be commissioned next spring, is the first carrier which we have designed originally for that purpose. The Lexington and Saratoga were converted from battle cruisers, and the Langley originally was a collier. Since carriers are such a new type, it would seem wise to delay using up our remaining tonnage in this category until the Ranger has been in commission for a time. It is important to test her thoroughly so as to be sure that we know just what features should be incorporated in future designs.

In destroyers our situation is vastly different. Indeed the United States is shockingly and dangerously deficient in this category. By treaty we are allowed 150,000 tons of them. A casual examination of the Navy list might lead one to think that our situation is satisfactory, for it now shows a total of 251 destroyers of 267,470 tons. The "nigger in the woodpile" is that every last one of them will have become over-age within the next few months, and their military usefulness is about at an end.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. WOODRUFF. As a matter of fact, have not a large majority of these destroyers been tied up at the docks for a number of years, out of commission?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. That is correct.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Is it not a fact that a ship out of commission deteriorates much more rapidly than one in commission?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. The gentleman is entirely correct about that.

Mr. WOODRUFF. And it is for that outstanding reason that it is important to replace these destroyers at the earliest possible date?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. That is right.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I wonder if the gentleman or his committee has given any thought to the dieselization of some of these ships? With all other nations dieselizing their merchant marine and navies, the United States seems, for some reason or other, to eliminate the diesel engine entirely, especially from use on battleships. There is no sound reason for this.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I may state to my colleague that is a technical engineering matter that is better passed on by the technical experts than by us laymen on the committee; but we all recognize in a general way the great usefulness and advantage of the diesel engine over some other types of engine, and it is to be hoped that the Navy will use that type of engine if they find it satisfactory.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I am very glad to hear the gentleman say that, but I wish to say to the gentleman that the trouble with the technical men in the Navy is that they are afraid to recommend dieselization of the battleships, because they say it is experimenting. It is not experimenting, because other nations of the world have done it with success. All other nations cannot be wrong and the United States right. The diesel engine should be installed in some of these ships.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I do not agree with the gentleman that the technical experts in the Navy Department are afraid to blaze out on new untired pathways or trails; but it is purely a technical matter as to the character and type of machinery used on the various types of ships and it must be handled by technical experts. Now, let me call attention again to the situation of the destroyers.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I do hope the Naval Affairs Committee will give this matter some thought. The diesel engine industry is needed in time of war. Every other large Government is helping the industry, but the United States at this time does nothing. It is essential that something be done. Let them put diesel engines in tankers, airplane carriers, mine layers, and so forth, if they do not want to place them in battleships. If this were done, the Navy would learn how valuable these engines are.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. They were built as a part of our effort in the World War, and the last of them were completed in 1922. From that year until 1932 we laid down not a single unit of this type, whereas in the same period Great Britain laid down 36, Japan 43, France 55, and Italy 39. Even if our war-time destroyers were as well designed as those recently built by foreign powers, which they most certainly are not, their very age would place them at a most serious disadvantage in action. One might as well expect a model T Ford which has been on the road for 10 years to give the same service as the latest V-8. A start has been made, under the leadership of President Roosevelt, toward remedying this bad situation. We now have under construction 32 destroyers which will aggregate 50,800 tons. However, this program must be recognized as a start only, and it is imperative that we continue uniformly.

In submarines our position is somewhat better, though far from satisfactory. The United States, Great Britain, and Japan are allowed to have 52,700 tons each in this category. At the end of the London Treaty the under-age tonnage remaining to each from those now in commission will be:

Country	Submarines	Tons
United States	18	24,810
Great Britain	30	38,400
Japan	38	52,272

In addition to the above, we have under construction 6 submarines of 7,460 tons, Great Britain 7 of 7,805 tons, and Japan has 6 of 8,200 tons. Besides these, Japan has appropriated for 9 more of 11,000 tons. Provided all of the above are completed, it is easy to see that our total of under-age tonnage at the expiration of the treaty will be 20,430 tons less than permitted, whereas Japan will have an excess of 18,772 tons. This excess is allowable under the provision of the treaty which authorizes the laying down of replacements 3 years in advance of the year in which the unit to be replaced becomes over-age. It emphasizes, however, the Japanese determination to keep right up to the treaty limits in contrast with our complete failure to do so. Also it should be remembered that the signatories are not required to reduce to the limits set until December 31, 1936. Until that date any excess tonnage which happens to exist may be retained.

There is a grave misunderstanding in our country as to what a Navy must be in order to exert its full influence for peace. Almost invariably, naval strength is spoken of in terms of the numbers of ships built and building, without consideration as to whether they are manned or whether it is possible to obtain trained crews for them. Some people seem to think that a ship is always ready whether she is manned or not.

At the time of our entrance into the World War, the United States possessed a highly trained battleship force, but little else. It became necessary immediately to expand the Navy very greatly, to provide armed guards for merchant ships, to train crews for the troop transports, without which our armies could not reach the scene of action; to man destroyers and submarine chasers and mine layers and converted yachts. But, to do these things trained men must be provided in great numbers, and there was no reservoir from which they could be drawn.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 10 additional minutes.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. We were fortunate indeed that the battleships were not required to engage in battle at once. By turning them into training schools and by placing each trained man where he would be most useful, it was possible to instill in many thousands of new men the rudiments of their naval duties. The task was accomplished and brilliantly, but please do not forget that it completely destroyed for the time being the readiness for action of a force which a few months before had been prepared for any emergency.

Mr. GOSS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. GOSS. Is the gentleman planning to offer an amendment to the pending bill which will increase the building program?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Of course it would not be in order. I will say that the Naval Affairs Committee is holding hearings today, and I hope during the week to report out a bill authorizing Congress to bring the Navy up to treaty strength.

Mr. GOSS. It is too bad the gentleman cannot give us that authorization while the bill is pending.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. The bill will probably be pending, because we hope to get it out of committee this week.

Mr. HEALEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. HEALEY. I observe that the item for pay, subsistence, and transportation is less in this bill than it was in the 1934 estimate. Does that mean it is contemplated to operate the naval vessels with a complement less than 100 percent?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. That is exactly it. I am coming to that right now.

Mr. MOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. MOTT. In view of what the gentleman just stated about the need for increased personnel for the Navy, what is the gentleman's opinion as to the bill that was offered by the administration at the last special session, and passed, providing that only one half the graduates of the Naval Academy should be commissioned?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I was thoroughly in accord with the bill, because we had more officers than we had ships. Now, we are building the ships and as soon as we get the ships we will have to have officers. We do not want the officers until we get the ships for them.

Mr. MOTT. That is true.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. And if the gentleman will help us get the ships, then we will have sufficient officers to man them.

Mr. HEALEY. Will the gentleman answer my question now?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I only have a few minutes remaining, I must finish first and then I will answer questions.

The problem then becomes largely that of providing in sufficient numbers the officers and men without whom the material is worthless. They must be especially trained in many fields. In the recruit, it takes a long time to acquire not only familiarity with the use of a particular weapon or instrument or piece of machinery but also with the habits and customs of the organization which he has joined. He must learn the relationship of the other parts of the ship to his own so that he may be able to take over the duties of someone else who has been disabled.

To develop such proficiency requires much time and still more is needed to retain it. After a thoroughly efficient man-of-war's man has been developed, you cannot store him as you do with guns and ammunition. To retain his skill, continued practice is demanded. That is why there must be a succession of maneuvers and drills and gunnery exercises.

The personnel of the Navy is not surpassed in excellence or in technical skill by any corresponding body of men in the world. Time after time, from the earliest days of the Republic, this branch of the service has faced crises and emergencies with never an incident of which we should not be proud. It will be many a long day before the cities of southern California forget the quickness and resourcefulness and general competence with which the battle fleet brought order out of the chaos caused by last spring's earthquake at Long Beach. The Navy develops good citizens and it instills loyalty, devotion to duty, and energy in officers and men alike.

The difficulty is that we have not enough of such men. In the attempt to reduce governmental expenditures, the number of enlisted men has gradually been reduced until now we have somewhat less than 79,000 instead of the number of 137,485 which is authorized by law. This has made it necessary to reduce the complements of ships below the danger point. Ships are being operated with crews that are entirely inadequate. The guns are not properly manned and the ships cannot steam at their maximum speed. Because of insufficient personnel, we are now operating some 30 destroyers with only 40 percent of the proper complement, in what is called a rotating reserve. The larger ships in active commission now have about 80 percent of their assigned complements.

Of course it is obvious that we cannot, in time of peace, maintain the Navy on a war footing. I feel strongly, however, in the present state of world affairs, that the ships of the active United States Fleet must have sufficient personnel to be ready to meet an emergency. This means that they must have not less than 85-percent complement, and they must be trained to the highest state of efficiency. To do this will require for the fiscal year 1935 a minimum of 85,000 men. For 1936 to provide for ships now building, which will then be ready to go in commission, that number must be increased to 93,000 men; for a peace-time treaty Navy, with only the minimum of auxiliary vessels, somewhere between 105,000 and 115,000 men. Then, if the need for mobilization should come, expansion could be carried on without destroying the readiness for battle which had previously been developed. Unless trained crews are made available, the building of ships is a futile gesture, misleading to our own people, and of very doubtful support to the national policies. Never again can we count on the assistance of some other fleet for a year or more while our own is being made ready. [Applause.]

Mr. MOTT. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. MOTT. In view of what the gentleman has just stated, does the gentleman still say it was proper to pass that bill at the last session, reducing the number of officers that could be commissioned in the Navy by one half?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I do, for the simple reason that we had no place for them. When we get the new ships we will have places for them.

Mr. MOTT. What is the gentleman advocating now in regard to increased personnel?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I am advocating that the enlisted strength be brought up to 85,000 men, and that we have sufficient officers to man the ships in existence today.

Mr. HEALEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. HEALEY. Will the appropriation contained in this bill supply sufficient money to maintain 85,000 personnel with competent naval officers?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I do not think so. I think it has got to be increased.

Mr. DOCKWEILER. What is the consensus of opinion in the Committee on Naval Affairs with respect to the order of the President bringing the fleet from the Pacific to the Atlantic coast at this time?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. The Committee on Naval Affairs does not delve into departmental matters. That is purely a question of policy. Of course, the people on the west coast want the fleet there all the time and the people on the east coast want it here; but let me say the Navy is not based on the west coast or is not based on the east coast, but is sent where national needs require it. [Applause.]

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to incorporate in the RECORD a resolution I introduced in the House.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. SWICK. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN].

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, first I desire to compliment the distinguished gentleman from Georgia [Mr. VINSON] on the speech he has just made. I think it is the best big-navy speech that has been made in the House in several years [applause], and I am very glad he made the speech today because he has the confidence of the Chief Executive. Any measure introduced by the gentleman from Georgia will receive kindly consideration at the hands of the distinguished gentleman now in the White House, I am sure.

The casual reader of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD tomorrow morning when he goes through that speech will wonder just why or how under the name of Heaven a country so enlightened as ours, a country so progressive as ours, a country so rich as ours, could allow itself to fall into such decay in its national defense through the past 15 or 20 years.

Mr. EAGLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRITTEN. I yield.

Mr. EAGLE. Why did it do so? I am like the casual reader; I should like to know why it did.

Mr. BRITTEN. In the first place, President Harding was completely deceived by Prime Minister Balfour, who came over here in 1921 for the first disarmament conference. The pacifists of the world were calling for disarmament. Well-intentioned people everywhere were calling for military disarmament. We had, as the gentleman from Georgia so properly said, the greatest, the strongest, the heaviest-hitting group of ships the world had ever known before and we were proceeding with their construction in an orderly manner. Well, the statesmen of England—and they are great statesmen; and the diplomats of France—and they are foxy and deceitful—devised what was called the Washington Disarmament Conference. President Harding and his group of statesman swallowed the conference bait, hook, line, and sinker—someone says including the bobbin and pole. He must be a fisherman!

I recall distinctly we agreed to scrap, to destroy the very backbone of our Navy in big ships. I remember distinctly Prime Minister Balfour, a tall handsome gentleman, when we had agreed on the 5–5–3 ratio for battleships and for tonnage on airplane carriers, nothing else; Balfour stood up in the hall of the Daughters of the American Revolution and slapped his hands on his chest like this, thoroughly pleased with what he had accomplished, and he said, "This 5–5–3 ratio is going to apply in principle to all the other categories."

Mr. Chairman, they did not get together definitely on cruiser tonnage, on destroyer tonnage and on submarine tonnage because that was not what England and France wanted; they did not want to get together on those categories because in this direction they were already vastly superior to us on the seas. So the thing to do was to clip our wings where we were becoming strong, and this was in the first-line ships, the big battleships. However, following the question of the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. EAGLE] Balfour had barely gotten back to England after suggesting that the 5-5-3 ratio would in principle prevail in the building of all new warships, when the British Admiralty started building more cruisers. In 7 years their cruiser tonnage was so preponderous, so superior to ours, that we were ridiculous on the high seas as far as a well-balanced first-class navy was concerned. The Washington Conference positively wrecked the American Navy in prestige as well as in real fighting value.

President Coolidge followed President Harding. The French and British kept telling us to wait with our cruiser plans until the Disarmament Conference in Geneva had a chance to determine on cruiser tonnage. All the time they were building more cruisers, more submarines, and more destroyers of the very latest type, built after the war and, of course, incorporating in their construction the lessons learned from the experience of the war while our poor old destroyers, a couple of hundred of them, had been built in any kind of a shipyard, in very short time, and under wartime conditions, not, of course, equal to the ordinary cruiser or destroyer which we could have built under different circumstances. Most of them were used in convoying troops and supplies to France. The disarmament preparatory conference, the disarmament conference, and various conferences have been going on between 9 and 11 years, never accomplishing anything but always handing out as bait to these misguided pacifists, men and women, that it would be foolish to spend money for warships now because that conference is going to take place next year in Geneva—always next year in Geneva. Finally Calvin Coolidge, who thought he was a great trader—and I think he was—a very great President, a very sincere man, and a man who was led by high ideals of disarmament and economy, believed what they said when they told him they would meet next year in Geneva and determine upon the proper limitation for cruisers, destroyers, and submarines. He was so convinced in the matter that he provided for no new construction whatever during that period.

The Coolidge Geneva Conference met and, like all of its predecessors, was a dismal failure. The President was sure he had been tricked by the European diplomats. He was bitter toward the entire outfit. He called our dear old friend Tom Butler, then chairman of the Navy Committee, down to the White House and he said: "Introduce a bill tomorrow morning to bring the Navy up to treaty strength." I do not know how many hundreds of millions of dollars that program was to cost. John Pugh over there can probably tell us. It ran about $800,000,000. President Coolidge wanted the authorization passed at once, he was so miffed, so hurt by the deceit that was practiced upon him by these foreign powers; he was prepared to show the world that he meant business; and Butler introduced that bill.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRITTEN. I yield.

Mr. McFADDEN. I happened to be in London when the bill was introduced. The headlines in the London paper said it was a $2,000,000,000 program. The British at that time were very much disturbed about it.

I hope the gentleman will get enough time to tell the House, in the same lucid manner that he is now speaking, how we were let down at the London Conference.

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes; I am coming to that.

At the time Coolidge's enormous bill was presented the country was startled by the fabulous sum suggested for the construction of warships by this economical President. Nothing came of that bill because it was what might almost be termed a spite bill—and I do not mean that in any derogatory sense to President Coolidge, but his feelings were terribly hurt.

France and England had definitely led him to believe they were prepared to agree with the United States on crusier and destroyer and submarine tonnage at a forthcoming conference. They led him to believe that they were going to reduce armaments, at least as far as the Navy was concerned, but they had not the slightest intention of doing that any more than they have of paying their debts unless we insist upon their doing so. They do not do business that way.

Then along came Mr. Hoover, completely mystified and deceived by these proposed conferences, each succeeding one sinking our Navy into further depths and utterly out of balance.

I talked with Mr. Hoover one day before he took the oath of office. He sent for me, as he sent for other chairmen of important committees, in order to talk about matters affecting their particular jurisdiction in the House. I had the same ideas about the Navy then that I have now. The gentleman from Georgia and I have always been together on these bills, our desire being to build up this great right arm of the national defense to a point where it is commensurate with our Nation's position in world affairs. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. VINSON] has always been for that and so have I.

I talked with Mr. Hoover about construction. He said he had just talked with Ramsay MacDonald, the great labor leader of England, and that while he did not tell me so, the new President was of the opinion that Ramsay MacDonald was going to control the British Admiralty and that Mr. MacDonald, being of a pacifistic trend himself and being an economist, would certainly see that the British Admiralty recommend a reduction in ships and in expenditures for the Navy. I said: "Mr. President, I do not believe that will transpire. I am satisfied that as in the past the British Admiralty will still control the British Nation, at least insofar as building warships is concerned, because they know more about its importance than Ramsay MacDonald does." He said, "Congressman, you do not know their new form of government."

This is what led me to believe what I have just told the House. What transpired? When he became President, Mr. Hoover was so certain that Ramsay MacDonald and the rest of those Britishers would agree upon reduction of armament and would live up to their promises that he did not authorize a single new ship during his tenure of office. Franklin Roosevelt did more, as I said the other day, with the scratch of a pen for the American Navy and the national defense than has been done by all of the rest of them put together in the past 14 years. [Applause.]

Let me suggest this thought to you. Take the greatest statesmen and leaders of the world today, men like Mussolini, Hitler, and Stalin. What do they say about the prospect of war? I do not mean a war between any particular two peoples. I mean a great conflagration that is likely to be as bad or even worse than the World War. Those men and their enunciations are what is responsible for the President's remark when he came here the other day and said that he could not view with any optimism the future of world peace. The President was not optimistic concerning that possibility. Why? No one in the United States should know more about world conditions than our President does. He has a very keen, up-to-date, alert mind. He is not being bamboozled by what these fellows on the other side say, but the great statesmen of the world say that within 12 months there will be a war and that the United States will become embroiled in it; in other words, that we will not be able to keep our country out of it.

We cannot pooh-pooh what they say and conjecture: What does that Frenchman know about this situation? Or what does that Britisher know about the situation? They study world politics much more deeply than we do.

If there is anything dangerous in the atmosphere today we certainly should not neglect our first line of defense. We have the money. We are spending $1,000,000 an hour in all sorts of artificial endeavors to kill this depression. Think of it, $1,000,000 an hour! We are spending that much money as I talk, for various artificial means to destroy the depression and correct this terrible situation of unemployment.

Mr. ALLGOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. ALLGOOD. The gentleman is an authority, I know, on naval affairs. What is the life of a first-line battleship, usually?

Mr. BRITTEN. Between 20 and 22 years, depending upon its upkeep and all. They regard it usually as 20 years.

Mr. ALLGOOD. So we have saved by carrying out the program of not building battleships during the last 14 or 15 years?

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes; we have saved money because since the World War we have not built any of those ships.

Mr. ALLGOOD. And in that way we have saved money to be applied on the national debt.

Mr. BRITTEN. For 10 years we reduced the national debt about $1,000,000,000 a year.

Mr. ALLGOOD. And has not the perfection of the bombing plane shown the futility of spending millions of dollars on battleships?

Mr. BRITTEN. No; that statement is entirely erroneous.

Mr. ALLGOOD. I wish the gentleman would explain that statement. I have always thought that the perfection of bombing planes had kept down such a building program. I am for national defense, but I have always thought that the development of the bombing plane has shown the futility of spending millions of dollars for battleships.

Mr. BRITTEN. We are spending now $1,000,000 an hour for artificial stimulation of trade and we are spending this money on matters of much less importance than the national defense. National defense, after all, is our very life. It is everything we have in the world, and surely nothing could be more important; and, as the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. VINSON] has very clearly pointed out, every dollar that goes into a battleship goes into some State for rubber, furniture, paint, steel, and practically everything that is manufactured in the United States, and, of course, the matter of employment of labor is also involved.

Without throwing a scare into the world that we are aiming at offense, the time to carry on this program is right now.

No nation on earth has anything that we desire by conquest. We are building 54 ships at the present time in our various Federal and private yards. Let us appropriate now more money for more ships and let us not think of saving money, as my good friend from Alabama [Mr. ALLGOOD] said a few minutes ago. While we wait on such construction we might be saving a little money, but we might be saving it at a tremendous future cost, because we need a Navy now that is completely up to date. [Applause.] You cannot make an officer in a day or in a year or in 10 years. You can prepare one for one of the lower grades, but you cannot make an officer who can go on a ship and be worth much in less than 10 years. Is war going to wait for 10 years on us?

Mr. McFARLANE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes.

Mr. McFARLANE. Does not the gentleman believe that some of the best money our country has ever spent was expended in building up the Navy to its proper strength during the administration of Theodore Roosevelt, and in the taking of our Navy around the world to let others see our first line of defense? As a peace gesture or as a matter of insurance, was not that worth more to our country than, perhaps, any other expenditure by our Government?

Mr. BRITTEN. I think it was worth 10 times what it cost.

In Europe and in Asia commerce and power go by "face", as they call it, and when they saw our great fleet, it gave them the impression that America was 10 or 15 or 20 times stronger than they had actually believed us to be. Millions of people in Europe and in Asia think we are still a young country, loaded with gold but with not much sense—and, because of our diplomacy, you can hardly blame them for feeling that way about it.

Our diplomacy during my lifetime has been exceedingly weak. I think I have known every Secretary of State in the last 22 years rather personally, and I think I have known most of the Under Secretaries and Assistant Secretaries of State. With one exception, and only one exception in my mind at the present moment, they were a lot of polite, bowing, intelligent, more or less humble individuals; and I am referring to the Department of State as it is made up now. I am not including Secretary Hull, because he has not been there long enough to indicate what he is going to do; but everybody in the State Department under Secretary Hull is too polite to even think of Japan or think of France or think of England in harsh terms. This would not be diplomatic, and we must not do it. We might not be invited to the next dinner at the Embassy if we said anything that would lead our President to say something harsh, and this would be terrible. My young friend here, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN], who knows everything, says I am scratched off the French list already [Laughter.] So are you, Jack.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I never was on the list.

Mr. BRITTEN. Neither was I.

We have a President in the White House who will think for himself and who is thinking for himself, and, unless I miss my guess, he is going to tell France and Belgium and Italy and England in no uncertain langauge just what we expect of them. [Applause.]

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRITTEN. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. PARSONS. Will the gentleman support him in the election next fall and support his program?

Mr. BRITTEN. I have been supporting his program on the floor here as strongly as has the gentleman; in fact, much stronger, because the gentleman from Illinois has not got on his feet and talked for his President as I have. [Laughter and applause.]

While I am not prepared to go into the details of the matter now, I am going to say what I intended to say at some time later in the week.

There is a clause in every one of our war-debt-funding treaties which provides that the debtor nation shall issue to the United States at any time or from time to time, at the request of the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, in exchange for all of the bonds proposed to be issued hereunder and held by the United States, definitive engraved bonds in the form suitable for sale to the public, in such amounts and denominations as the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States may request, in bearer form, and otherwise on the same terms and conditions as to dates of issue and maturity, rate or rates of interest, exemption from taxation, and the like, as the bonds surrendered on such exchange, except that the bonds shall carry such provision for repayment of principal as shall be agreed upon; provided, that if no agreement to the contrary is arrived at, any such bonds shall contain separate provision for payments before maturity, conforming substantially to the table of repayments of principal prescribed by paragraph 6 of this proposal and in form satisfactory to the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, such payments to be computed on a basis to accomplish the retirement of any such bonds by 15th of December 1984. The debtor nation shall deliver definitive engraved bonds to the United States in accordance herewith within 6 months of receiving notice of any such request from the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States and pending the delivery of the definitive engraved bonds shall, at the request of the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, deliver temporary bonds or interim receipts in a form to be agreed upon within 3 months of the receipt of such requests.

Mr. Chairman, I now call upon the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Morgenthau, and I now call upon President Roosevelt to request of all our European debtors that the billions we now hold in our vaults in large notes, be exchanged for their bonds of small denominations which we may from time to time sell at the world market price when they become due and payable. It is not my expectation that we would ever destroy the French or the British bond market but on the contrary we would carefully preserve that market for its own best interests. The world could easily absorb the French and British annual war debt payments without the slightest effect upon their bond markets if the matter were judiciously handled.

Mr. McFARLANE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes.

Mr. McFARLANE. Does not the gentleman believe we should now appoint a fact-finding commission to investigate the ability to pay of all defaulting nations?

Mr. BRITTEN. No; I think President Roosevelt will do that. I am willing to take my chances on his judgment. He is forceful and he has today the respect of the entire world. He will get all the money if it can be done, and he will get it if he insists on the exchange of the large notes that we now hold for bonds of small denominations—$50, $100, $500, $1,000.

Mr. McFARLANE. The gentleman thinks that will be done?

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes; I do. I hope it will be done, and I now call upon the President in this rather unprepared manner, because I expected to talk later in the week about it—I am calling upon him to request the exchange of these notes and use those new bonds as the very foundation for our financial structure. It can be done—let him demand the exchange, and each year as the 50, 60, or 70 million dollars comes due, let us sell the bonds somewhere at the regular market price. Sell the bonds of small denominations in Paris or Belgium or Italy. I hope Mr. Morgenthau will call upon the debtor nations for exchange of our large notes for small-denomination bonds, so that we can dispose of them in the open market. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS].

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, very high regard is accorded party nominations throughout the South. Nominating contests are spirited and oftentimes bitter, but when nominations are made our citizens then forget party differences and go to the polls and vote for party nominees.

Our people have felt that party responsibility is essential and must be maintained. Accordingly every Southern State has set up ways and means of nominating candidates. In comparatively recent years the instrumentality used is the party primary. The qualifications to vote in these primaries are the same generally as the qualifications of electors prescribed in general election laws, with the added essential that the voter must be a member of the political party at whose primary he offers to vote. In most, if not all, States the State or district party committees have the right to add additional qualifications to vote in such primaries.

Party primaries came into existence because of the abuses that grew out of the old convention system. Circumstances arise, however, now and then where it is difficult, if not impossible, to use the primary to nominate party candidates, and in such cases the method used is left entirely to the governing party authority. Such statutes have been found necessary because it is believed necessary that a political party or parties have a candidate in every election whom all party affiliates can support as the party nominee.

In my own State, full respect by members of my own political party was accorded party nominations and the findings of legally constituted party organizations until the general election of 1932 for Members of Congress.

The Legislature of Mississippi passed a redistricting act. Many of our citizens were dissatisfied with it because it did not place in each of the congressional districts of the State an equal number of citizens. The validity of this law was immediately attacked in the courts. The Supreme Court of the State of Mississippi upheld its validity. Certain United States district judges held that it violated Federal statutes. The State Democratic executive committee accepted the views of the State supreme court and ordered congressional primaries by congressional districts, and congressional primaries were held by districts, and the Members of the delegation from Mississippi in this House were nominated by the voters of their respective districts.

Immediately after the holding of the primaries candidates holding themselves out as Democrats announced as candidates for Congress from the State at large in the general election in November. They contended there was no primary and criticized severely the action of the State Democratic executive committee in calling the primaries by districts. Then we saw in Mississippi a controversy arise that would have destroyed all respect for party responsibility and for party nominations in the future. Fortunately the Supreme Court of the United States advanced the case and decided it prior to the elections upholding our redistricting act.

I am firm in the belief that full respect and confidence must be accorded our party State organizations and their findings, otherwise party nominations are worthless and party organizations are useless.

With my own distasteful experience fresh in mind, upon learning of the congressional contest in the State of Louisiana I determined to investigate the facts in the controversy and the Louisiana law to satisfy myself if this case was at all similar to my own.

The essential facts relating to this contest are as follows:

Hon. Bolivar E. Kemp died June 19, 1933. About 10 days later Mrs. Kemp, his widow, announced that she would become a candidate to succeed her husband for his unexpired term. Immediately upon making this announcement her friends circulated petitions asking her to become a candidate and pledging her their support. About 35,000 persons signed these petitions. About 25,000 of them, with their addresses, were published in one or more newspapers of general circulation in the State of Louisiana. The persons signing these petitions constitute a very large part of the electorate of the district, for at the primary in which Mr. Kemp was nominated the total vote cast was 42,104.

Sometime after Mrs. Kemp's announcement, Mr. Sanders, Jr., Mr. Whitman, Mr. Silvert, and Mr. Nelson announced themselves also as candidates. Upon her announcement Mrs. Kemp requested the Governor of the State to set a date for the filling of the existing vacancy.

I have been told that the Governor stated that there would be an election held in Louisiana at an early date at which time the people of Louisiana would vote on the question of repealing the eighteenth amendment, and that when the date was fixed for this election that he would call a special congressional election for the same date.

The special election was not immediately called. Thereupon a petition for mandamus against the Governor was filed in the Federal court for the eastern district of Louisiana to compel him to call a special election to fill this vacancy. The district judge before whom the case was heard dismissed the proceedings with the announcement that the Constitution and laws of the United States impose upon the Governor full and complete discretion and authority to issue writs of election to fill such vacancies and that the courts were without jurisdiction.

At a later date a petition signed by several thousand citizens of the district was presented to the Governor, requesting and demanding that he order an election to fill this vacancy " in order that the Sixth District may have a Representative in the coming session of Congress."

After a lapse of a few days the Governor called the election. His proclamation was dated November 27, and the date set to hold the election was December 5. In calling the election it is presumed that the Governor acted upon advice of the attorney general—and I am advised that the attorney general, or one of his assistants, so testified.

Immediately upon the proclamation of the Governor the congressional executive committee, which is a subcommittee of the State central committee—an elective body—was called together for the purpose of selecting the Democratic nominees for the special election to be held December 5. The committee met in New Orleans at the headquarters of the State Democratic executive committee. A majority of its members were present in person or by proxy, and Mrs. Kemp was chosen by said committee as the Democratic nominee.

In the election of December 5 Mrs. Kemp's name appeared on the ballot as the regular Democratic nominee. No other name appears on said ballot, but there was a space on the ballot where the name of any other could be written in or voted for by the voters participating in the election.

An election was held in 9 of the 12 parishes. It was not held in 3 of them because an injunction was issued by Judge Tycer, of the Twenty-first Judicial District Court of Louisiana, enjoining the election officials from distributing the ballots. Other efforts were made to discourage the voters from participating in the election in many of the parishes comprising the district. An excess of 5,000 votes was polled, practically all of them voted for Mrs. Kemp. In such elections the vote is rarely as much as 5,000, and has been as low as 3,000, so I am advised. Mrs. Kemp having received the greatest number of votes cast in said election, and the result having been certified to the secretary of the State, the Governor issued his certification of election of Mrs. Kemp to the Clerk of the United States House of Representatives.

Certain citizens of the district, constituting themselves into an organization known as the "Citizens' Election Committee of the Sixth Congressional District of the State of Louisiana", called an election to fill the same vacancy and fixed the date for their election at December 28, and at this citizens' election committee's election Mr. J. Y. Sanders, Jr., received the largest number of votes cast in the election, and the citizens' election committee transmitted to the Clerk of the United States House of Representatives a certification of election of Mr. Sanders.

These are the facts as they have come to me. The only ones that are of prime importance are:

First. That the election was called November 27.

Second. That the date of the election was fixed at December 5.

Third. That on November 27, at 4 p.m., the congressional executive committee, a subcommittee of the State central Democratic executive committee, met in the city of New Orleans, at the headquartes of the State Central Committee, and selected Mrs. Kemp as the Democratic nominee to be voted for in the special election to be held December 5.

Fourth. That the ballots issued in the special election provided space on which the name or names of other candidates could be written in and voted for.

Fifth. That certain citizens of the district ordered another election to fill this vacancy and certified the result of said alleged election to the Clerk of the United States House of Representatives.

Section 31 of the Revised Statutes of the United States is as follows:

> Before the first meeting of each Congress the Clerk of the next preceding House of Representatives shall make a roll of the Representatives-elect, and place thereon the names of those persons, and of such persons only, whose credentials show that they were regularly elected in accordance with the laws of their States, respectively, or the laws of the United States.

Accordingly, the Clerk of the House made a roll of Representatives, and the name of Mrs. Kemp appeared upon the roll as the Member-elect from the Sixth District of Louisiana. Upon the convening of the House, however, Mrs. Kemp's name was not called, nor was it included in the list of Members-elect furnished to the Speaker in a communication from the Clerk of the House, dated January 3, 1934. In another communication to the Speaker, the Clerk of the House transmitted a certificate of election of Mrs. Kemp and also transmitted a communication from the so-called "Citizens' Election Committee." This letter is as follows:

Hon. HENRY T. RAINEY,
Speaker of the House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: I transmit herewith a certificate of election of Mrs. Bolivar E. Kemp, Sr., to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Hon. Bolivar E. Kemp, from the Sixth Congressional District of the State of Louisiana, attested by the seal and by the secretary of state of the State of Louisiana.

I also transmit herewith a communication from the Citizens' Election Committee of the Sixth Congressional District of the State of Louisiana, in the form of a certificate of election of Hon. J. Y. Sanders, Jr., to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Hon. Bolivar E. Kemp, from Sixth Congressional District of the State of Louisiana.

Yours very truly,

SOUTH TRIMBLE,
Clerk of the House of Representatives.

After the reading of this letter the following resolution was offered and adopted and referred to the Committee on Elections No. 3:

House Resolution 202

Resolved, That the question of prima facie as well as the final right of Mrs. Bolivar E. Kemp, Sr., and J. Y. Sanders, Jr., contestants, respectively, claiming a seat in this House from the Sixth District of Louisiana, be referred to the Committee on Elections No. 3; and until such committee shall have reported in the premises and the House decided such question, neither of said contestants shall be admitted to a seat.

On Saturday last, January 20, the Chairman of the Committee on Elections No. 3 filed the committee's report. The report in substance denies to Mrs. Kemp the right to be treated as a Member-elect and sworn in as a Member upon her certificate of election from proper authority. It also holds that the election was not properly called, and is therefore null and void. It makes certain criticisms of the manner of calling the election and the constituted authorities of the State. It also denies to Mr. Sanders a seat and holds that the so-called "election" held by the citizens' committee was no election and therefore is null and void.

In presenting what I consider the law in this case, I shall discuss only the legal phases of the controversy. I am in nowise concerned with factional differences that concern the people of Louisiana. The membership of this House wishes to do equal and exact justice by each of these contestants and at the same time uphold the precedents of this House in its consideration of such cases.

Under the terms of the resolution there are two questions to be decided: I. The prima facie right of Mrs. Kemp to be sworn in as a sitting Member of this House. II. The final right of Mrs. Kemp or Mr. Sanders to be seated as a Member of this House.

I

The first of these questions is of the utmost importance to the membership of this House. To my knowledge, it has been an unbroken custom of the House, except for a short time during the Civil War period, to seat a Member-elect upon a prima facie showing after the certificate was shown complete and legal. Mr. William McKinley, of Ohio, in the case of Ezra B. Taylor, seated by the House on December 13, 1880, stated that Mr. Taylor's "prima facie right to be sworn in was perfect, the certificate raising no doubt as to its completeness and legality." The only cases to be found where Members-elect with proper credentials were denied seats as sitting Members are those (1) where the qualifications of the Members-elect were questioned, or (2) their loyalty to the Government of the United States attacked in times of war, or (3) because of other personal ineligibilities. Even the Civil War cases cannot be properly cited in this case.

In these cases Confederate troops occupied a large part of the territory where the elections were held and the House of Representatives was of the opinion that under such circumstances the credentials were not in proper form, were from improper persons, and perhaps were issued under fear and coercion. No such question is involved in this case.

I invite the Membership of this House to investigate Hinds' Precedents of the House of Representatives on this subject, and especially pages 766 and 767 of volume 6. In one instance the House gave prima facie effect to credentials, although there appeared a question as to the regularity of the writs of election (vol. 1, sec. 328).

Another case holds a vacancy in a contested seat being filled by a special election, the House seated the new Member on his credentials, but held that his final right must depend on the issue of the contest (vol. 1, sec. 735).

Another is to this effect: The Senate gave immediate prima facie effect to regular credentials, although a memorial impeached the regularity and legality of the election (vol. 1, sec. 551).

There is only one safe policy for this House to pursue, and that is to accept the Governor's certificate. The Governor is the State's chief executive. He is usually a man of high standing and character, and therefore no better authority can be selected upon which to issue these certificates.

Grave dangers will arise if we depart from the unbroken custom of this House and put the responsibility for the seating of Members in the discretion of a Clerk whose very position as Clerk can depend upon the rolls of the House that he is charged with preparing. It is far better to leave the responsibility of issuing certificates of election to the Governors of our respective States and then give full force and credit to these certificates. If it is found that fraud has been practiced in an election a majority vote of the House can later unseat the Member.

If the practice of denying a seat to Members whose credentials are in proper force is begun, a minority membership of this House, with a friendly Clerk can, under certain contingencies, prevent an organization of the House by the majority. This House does not want to bring about a situation which will permit such misuse and abuse of authority.

Mr. GIFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GIFFORD. I would like to ask the gentleman if it was not proper for the House itself to determine the prima facie question on the first day of the session, and if it is not a fact that the committee were instructed to determine the prima facie question as well as the ultimate right?

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. I believe the House should have seated Mrs. Kemp upon her prima facie showing. Her credentials were in regular form.

II

Permit me now to talk to you about Mrs. Kemp's final right to retain a seat in this House.

Upon the death of Congressman Kemp a vacancy in the House from the Sixth District of Louisiana occurred. The Constitution of the United States, clause 4 of section 2 of article I, provides that—

When vacancies happen in the Representatives of any State, the executive authority thereof shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies.

Section 2713 of the Louisiana General Statutes provides:

In case of vacancies in said office of Representative in Congress between the general elections, it shall be the duty of the Governor, by proclamation, to cause an election to be held according to law to fill such vacancies. Elections shall be held in the precincts and at the polling places hereinafter defined and hereinbelow directed to be established (act 1916, no. 130, sec. 6).

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? I think the gentleman has misquoted the law.

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. I am reading it just exactly as it is.

Mr. WILSON. The gentleman says that the Governor shall call the election according to law, and it does not specify the time. It is according to the law of the State, which provides it shall be preceded by a primary.

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. The Constitution of the United States and the laws of Louisiana nowhere require nominating primaries in such cases as this. The gentleman does not properly interpret the statute he has in mind. It merely provides that when primaries are ordered 10 days must elapse between the call and the election. This cannot mean there must be a primary.

Mr. WILSON. The gentleman will have to show something absolutely contrary to the law in the State of Louisiana.

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. There is no restriction upon the Governor in calling elections to fill vacancies in Congress. He can call the election when he sees fit. The 10-day provision that the gentleman has in mind relates to the first primary. There could be a second one, and, in all, 62 days would be the required time that should elapse, if the gentleman's contention is correct.

It will be observed that both the Constitution of the United States and the Louisiana election laws confer upon the Governor complete authority to issue writs of election to fill vacancies in Congress. There is no restriction whatever upon the executive. He can call the election at any time that he sees fit. There is no authority conferred by the Constitution of the United States or the statutes of Louisiana upon any other person or persons whatsoever to call elections to fill vacancies in Congress. In the instant case, because the Governor of Louisiana failed to immediately call an election to fill the vacancy of Congressman Kemp, one of the candidates filed a petition for mandamus before a Federal district judge in New Orleans to compel the Governor to call an election to fill such vacancy. The district judge, recognizing the plain language of the Constitution of the United States and the election laws of the State of Louisiana, dismissed the proceedings, holding that both the Constitution and the laws of Louisiana confer this duty exclusively upon the Governor, but without mandate as to when he must act. My own opinion is that even if the Louisiana election laws did require the Governor to call an election within a given period of time, the election laws would be in conflict with the provisions of the Constitution of the United States and therefore null and void.

The Louisiana election laws dealing with vacancies in the office of Representatives in Congress are in no wise in conflict with the provisions of the Constitution of the United States but follow the language of the Constitution. It is the opinon of every court or authority that has given the question any serious study, that the Governor can call an election in 2 days, a week, a month, 3 months, or within any other time that suits him. It is even contended that he could refuse to call an election at all, and this has been done in many instances. The objection that has been raised by the House committee, if I understand the language of the report, is that sufficient time was not given for the holding of the election so that a primary could be held between the date of the proclamation of the Governor and the date of the holding of the election. This contention is wholly without merit as will be observed by an examination of McCrary on elections, paragraphs 185 and 186, as follows:

In the case of McKune against Weller, the question whether a proclamation giving notice of the holding of a special election held to fill a vacancy caused by the death of an incumbent was necessary to the validity of such election is discussed at length. The authorities upon the subject are there reviewed with care, and the conclusion is reached that there is an important distinction to be observed between general and special elections. The time, place, and manner of holding the former being fixed by law, the electors may and indeed must take notice of them, and as to such elections the statutory requirement of public notice by proclamation or otherwise may be regarded as directory only. But it was held that the statute requiring the Governor to issue his proclamation of election "to fill vacancies" which occur not in the ordinary way by the expiration of the term, but by death or resignation before the term expires, is mandatory and an essential prerequisite to all such election.

It was held by the House of Representatives of the United States, after an exhaustive discussion, that where the legislature of the State has failed to provide the time, place, and manner of holding an election to fill a vacancy occurring in the House, that the Governor of such State, upon being informed of the vacancy, may issue a writ of election and therein fix the time and places of holding such election. (See case of John Hoge of Pennsylvania, Clarke and Hall. Contested elections in Congress.) The power given to the Governor by the second section of the first article of the Constitution of the United States to issue writs of election to fill vacancies carries with it the power to fix the times and places of holding such election in cases where such times and places are not fixed by law.

It is, of course, desirable, and indeed necessary, that the proclamation be made of such election, or that it appear that it was generally known for a reasonable length of time, though in the case just referred to, it was held that a very short notice (only 2 or 3 days) was sufficient, when it appeared that the election was fixed for the same day as the election for President and Vice President of the United States, and where it was evident that the great mass of the electors were in fact apprised of it, and participated in it. (McCrary on Elections, 4th ed., pp. 138–139.)

In the instant case I dare say that everybody in the Sixth Congressional District of Louisiana knew that an election for Congressman was to be held on December 5, 1933. The newspapers were filled with news about it. The very fact that one of the judges issued an injunction against the holding of the election in three parishes of the district was itself evidence of the wide-spread interest the notice of the Governor's proclamation received. The judge's action in swearing in several hundred deputies to enforce his order was also well known by everybody in the district. Every citizen of the district had an opportunity to go to the polls and vote, except where prevented by said injunction, and had ample notice of the date of the election.

The Governor had the exclusive power and authority to call this election and to fix the time and places for the holding of the election. It is also plain that he had the authority to call the election within 1 week after the issuance of his proclamation. It is also equally plain that there is no other authority that has any control whatever over the matter or over his acts.

I now direct your attention to the action of the congressional executive committee in naming Mrs. Kemp as the Democratic nominee for Congress from the Sixth Congressional District of Louisiana. Under the Louisiana primary election laws a nominating primary to fill a vacancy cannot be held unless 10 days elapse from the date of the proclamation of the Governor ordering the election and the date of the primary. (Acts 1922, no. 97, sec. 9, and also sec. 2659 Louisiana General Statutes.)

With the proclamation of the Governor issued November 27, the earliest possible date that a primary could be held was December 8. There were five candidates for this office. The probabilities are that no one of the five candidates would have received a majority of the votes cast in the primary election. Under the Louisiana primary election law if one of the candidates fails to receive a majority of the votes cast in the said primary, then a second primary is ordered at which the two leading candidates become the candidates in the run-off.

Under section 2677, Louisiana General Statutes (act 1922) no. 97, sec. 27), it is provided that—

> In all elections where returns are by this act provided to be made to the secretary of state, he shall immediately proceed to tabulate and compile the same, and shall within 8 days after the date of said primary election promulgate same in the official journal of the State, and shall forward under a special stamp a certified copy thereof under his signature and seal of office to the chairman of the committee ordering the primary.

This same section provides further that the second primary—

> Shall be held with the same election officers and at the same places as the first primary was held 5 weeks from the date of the first primary: Provided, That if this day should fall on Mardi Gras, then the second primary shall be held 6 weeks from the date of the first primary.

There must elapse after the second primary sufficient time for the votes to be counted and canvassed and a report made to the secretary of state, so that he can be advised who has finally been nominated. Under this same section, 8 days is allowed for this purpose. It will be seen therefore that at least 62 days must elapse between the proclamation of the Governor calling a special election to fill the vacancy in Congress and the date set for said election before nominating primaries could be held in the State of Louisiana.

The Governor evidently realized that it was impossible for the primary to be held prior to January 1, 1934. He knew that he had only 33 days in which an election could be held to fill this vacancy.

Under the laws of the State of Louisiana a new registration of voters is automatically made every 4 years. Section 2629, Louisiana General Statutes (acts no. 1921, no. 122, sec. 15; 1926, no. 269, sec. 1), in part is as follows:

> The registration of voters for each and every parish throughout the State, Parish of Orleans excepted, shall make a new and complete registration of the qualified voters of their respective parishes every 4 years, commencing on the 2d day of January 1922.

This section requires a new registration throughout the State in the year 1934. Under the Louisiana Statutes 30 days is permitted to carry out this registration. The law also provided that no person shall be permitted to register within 30 days of any general or primary election (ibid.).

The earliest date when an elector could be qualified in Louisiana, outside of the Parish of Orleans, would be at best March 2. Add to this the 62 days necessary for holding the primaries, we find that if the Governor waited until after the 1st of January that the earliest possible time a successor to fill this vacancy could be named would be during the early days of May, and Congress will likely be in adjournment at that time.

The Governor, of necessity, had to call an election before January 1 if one was to have been called. It is also plain that primaries could not have been held between November 27 and January 1.

How, then, did Mrs. Kemp receive her nomination, and was her nomination regular and in compliance with Louisiana primary election statutes? Acts, 1922, no. 97, section 31 (2681 Dart.), is as follows:

> That all vacancies caused by death or resignation or otherwise among the nominees selected by any political party, under the provisions of this act, shall be filled by the committee, which has jurisdiction over the calling and ordering of the said primary election, and in the event that no person shall have applied to become a candidate for a political office within the time fixed by law, or the call of the committee ordering the primary, or in any other event wherein the party shall have no nominee selected under the provisions of this act, the committee calling the primary shall select the nominee for any position named in the call of the committee and shall have full authority to certify said name as the nominee of the said party: Provided, however, That wherever, for any reason, any contest filed in court shall not be finally decided in time to print the name of the nominee of the party upon the ticket at election, then the political party committee shall certify the name of the person who is the contestee in the suit filed, and the name of the said contestee shall be printed upon the ticket as the nominee of said political party, and no court shall have jurisdiction to enjoin such action.

Acting under the provisions of this section, the chairman of the State central committee issued his call to the congressional executive committee, which met in New Orleans at 4 p.m., November 27. Louisiana, like every other Southern State, has made provisions for the nomination of candidates by primary; but realizing that there are cases exceptional in their very nature where candidates cannot be nominated in primaries, as was so in this case, statutes have been enacted to take care of such eventualities. This section provided for (1) the filling of vacancies that have been caused by death, resignation, or otherwise after nominations have been made by primaries and before the general election is held; (2) it also provides for the nomination of party candidates where no person has offered himself as a candidate in a primary; (3) it also recognizes that there are other contingencies that can arise, so it provides " in any other event where the party shall have no nominee selected under the provisions of this act, the committee calling the primary shall select the nominee ", and so forth.

It is contended by some that under the provisions of this statute a primary must have been held or called before a nomination could be made by the committee. The act does contemplate such cases. It goes further and takes care of those cases where the party does not have a nominee at all. If the contention of the gentlemen who are urging that this section is applicable only to those cases where nominees have died, and so forth, or where no persons have filed as candidates, then it would be useless and foolish to use the further language, " or in any other event wherein the party shall have no nominee selected ", and so forth. We may as well recognize that the plain intendment of this section is to provide that a political party in Louisiana shall have under any and all circumstances in every election, general or special, a party nominee whom the members of that party can support in the election.

It has been stated that the language describing the committee shows that the purpose of this statute is to restrict committee nominations to vacancies occurring after nominations have been made or where no party candidates have filed as candidates. I insist that the words " calling the primary " is merely descriptive of the committee whose duty it is to make the nomination. Were it not for this descriptive language, some other congressional committee might claim the right to make the nominations.

It is plain that the committee under the circumstances had the right to make a nomination. There were five candidates. One of them had petitions filed in her behalf signed by 35,000 people asking her to become a candidate. There were about 60,000 registered voters in the district. There were 42,000 who participated in the last Democratic primary. Under the circumstances, therefore, since it is necessary for the Democratic Party to have a nominee, there was only one choice that the committee could logically make, and that was to select Mrs. Kemp as the party nominee, and this was done, and under the circumstances I think as long as it is the committee's responsibility as the governing authority of the party that no one could complain.

The committee is an elective body, voted for as other candidates. They are public officers within the meaning of Louisiana law for party purposes. Furthermore, this same statute provides that no court shall have jurisdiction to enjoin their action. The statute was passed in 1922 by the Legislature of the State of Louisiana, and it is a valid statute, and in the instant case its provisions have been followed.

In the special election no one was denied the right to become a candidate for Congress. There was ample space upon the ballot where the name or names of candidates could be written in and voted for. The setting aside of this space on the ballot was not an accident; it is provided for under Louisiana law. Section 2780 (acts 1916, no. 130, sec. 73; 1932, no. 160, sec. 1) provides that for a voter—

> Desiring to vote for a person other than the nominee of a political party, he must write in his own hand the name of such person in the space provided for such purposes—

And so forth.

The person desiring to become a candidate by this method must announce himself as a candidate at least 3 days before the election, and he must file with the clerk of the court of the parish in which he resides a statement that he is a candidate.

Similar statutes appear in the laws of many States. Frequently candidates are elected in such ways. I remember very distinctly down in Memphis in the early political years of my good friend Congressman ED CRUMP that he and his friends elected in this way a candidate named Reight. For a long number of years afterward he and his associates were referred to by their political enemies as "Reight writers."

The election called by certain citizens of this district under which Mr. Sanders claims a seat was without any legal authority whatsoever. The Constitution of the United States reposes this duty and responsibility exclusively in the Governor.

I do hope that my colleagues will investigate for themselves the facts and the law in this case. There are too many serious questions involved in this contest. Our own right to be seated after proper credentials have been presented by us is one of them. The others are equally serious and outstanding.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has again expired.

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 1 minute more.

Mr. COLLINS of Mississipi. I now yield to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WILSON].

Mr. WILSON. I just want to ask the gentleman relative to the certification by the committee of a nomination on a ticket, whether in every exception he read there, if that did not occur after the primary had been ordered according to law.

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. No.

Mr. WILSON. And no name appearing on the ticket?

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. I do not understand the gentleman.

Mr. WILSON. Where the democratic committee certified a nominee on a ticket, every exception was after the primary had been called, and there was no nominee on the ticket. Is not that what the law says?

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. No.

Mr. WILSON. The gentleman did not read the law.

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. The gentleman is very much mistaken. I imagine I know as well as anyone the law in this case. I have dispassionately discussed it and other Louisiana laws. I am not concerned with factional differences in Louisiana.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has again expired.

Mr. SWICK. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN].

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I listened with a high degree of interest to the rather distressing prophecies made by my genial colleague from Illinois relative to the next war, and I have listened to his solicitude for a Navy second to none. I am in accord with his sentiment, but I am wondering, after all, whether in dealing with millions and millions of dollars to fabricate instrumentalities of death, the human heart has gotten so encrusted that we cannot think a little bit about those who are going to be the victims of those instrumentalities of destruction. I refer particularly to the controversy that began in the morning press in Washington between the distinguished general who presides over the destinies of the Veterans' Bureau and the national commander of the American Legion. I want to relate it briefly to the independent offices appropriation bill, with a legislative section, that was passed in this chamber a week or two ago.

I understand there has been introduced in the body over at the other end of this Capitol, a bill by Senator GEORGE embodying the 4-point program of the American Legion. At the same time there has been introduced over there an amendment by Senator REED, of Pennsylvania, that embodies the same program. I understand also that the Parliamentarian of the Senate has indicated that it is perfectly proper to introduce the Reed amendment to the independent offices appropriation bill, provided the subject matter of that amendment is germane to the bill. In the event the Vice President or the Presiding Officer overrules the contention that it is germane, he can, in turn, be overruled by that body, by a simple majority. In a secret poll that was conducted in the Senate on the 18th of January, I understand there are enough votes in the Senate to overcome any adverse ruling by the Presiding Officer; so that, in substance, a simple majority will be able to write the Reed amendment into the independent offices appropriation bill. That may have been the reason why the majority leader of the Senate rushed to the White House on the afternoon of January 18——

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order against the speech being made by the gentleman. I do not want to disturb him. The gentleman may not be familiar with the rules, and I mean no discourtesy, but it is clearly in violation of the rules of the House for a Member either in the House or in Committee to refer to votes or actions or positions of Senators in the other end of the Capitol.

Mr. DIRKSEN. That part of my remarks may be expunged if it is not in accord with the rule, but it simply gives the background to what I am leading up to.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. LANHAM). The Chair will read the provision in Jefferson's Manual with reference to this matter:

> It is a breach of order in debate to notice what has been said on the same subject in the other House, or the particular votes or majorities on it there; because the opinion of each House should be left to its own independency, not be influenced by the proceedings of the other; and the quoting them might beget reflections leading to a misunderstanding between the two Houses.

The Chair is constrained, under these circumstances, to sustain the point of order. The gentleman will please proceed in order.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Very well. That is only a background to the thing I have in mind, and that is the subject matter of the Reed amendment, which embodies the 4-point program, designed first of all to restore pay to service-connected disabled veterans who have been cut off under the provisions of the Economy Act; secondly, to restore, or rather, in the first instance, to grant to widows and orphans, irrespective of whether they are widows and orphans of those who died from service-connected disability or not, of a Federal pension; and, third, the program of hospitalization, whereby those ex-service men who are in distress and have no money with which to pay for hospitals, shall have a right to go to existing facilities, irrespective of that fact and irrespective of whether their disabilities are service-connected or not; and, finally, the fourth point of that program is to reestablish service connection for those presumptive cases that were wiped from the rolls through the instrumentality of the Economy Act. General Hines takes exception to the program, and he has submitted a brief of figures. The American Legion leadership has submitted a brief of figures, and apparently there is a variation of several million dollars. I am not going to be so ungracious as to publicly characterize General Hines as an unmitigated liar, even though I believe so, but I do believe that he has been so grossly careless with figures that he might qualify as a charter member of the Ananias Club. [Applause.]

When the program of the American Legion has figures that have been submitted, and we compare them with the figures that emanate from the Veterans' Bureau, showing that General Hines has made a mistake before the joint committee before, of millions and millions of dollars, I submit that we have a right, as a matter of fact, to cherish some incredulity as to the figures that come from the Veterans' Bureau now.

Now, that is the program of the American Legion. Let us look at the regulations that were issued by the White House last Saturday afternoon to ascertain precisely how close they come to it. It seems to me we have been asking for a dog from the White House and we got a tail. That is about all, that is represented by the twenty-one-odd million dollars, supposedly allocated to veterans' benefits, starting, first of all, with the restoration of the basic pay in all grades; from nine to ten dollars, from eighteen to twenty dollars, and from ninety to a hundred; but I submit, and I want it clearly borne in mind by everyone in this chamber, that that provision does not restore a single disabled ex-service man to the disability rolls; not one. If you had gotten that idea about it from those regulations, you might just as well dismiss it from mind, because not a single soldier is going to be restored to the rolls, nor are they going to repay or reimburse them for the 25 percent that was taken away from the service-connected veterans under the provisions of Public, No. 2, better known as the Economy Act.

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Does the gentleman know that out of this $21,000,000 the pension is to be increased to the officers' widows but not to the widows of privates?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I understand that is true. Now, item no. 2, of significant import where veterans of the World War are concerned, is the so-called "hospitalization feature." Let me impress upon you now that this additional regulation does not give the veteran a single thing he does not already enjoy under present regulations. All it does is to make available an additional $8,000,000. For what purpose? Why? Simply to give transportation to those who may be admitted to hospitals under present regulations; but in this respect it does not broaden the hospitalization privileges the veteran already enjoys.

One other thing in the program: They increased the burial allowance from $75 to $100. There is something ironic to me about that, because they wait until the veteran is taken from the face of the earth before they allow an additional $25 to take him away in a rough box, something altogether ironical, I should say about this $21,000,000 veterans' provision that it is expected to appease them at the present time for all the losses they suffered under Public Act No. 2.

There is also a provision that total permanent service-disabled veterans need not particularly prove 90 days of service to get the $30 per month. How generous, I should say, to those who are infirm in mind or body, from whom has been taken away total capacity to earn a living! We are going to say to them: "You do not have to prove 90 days of military service in order to get a niggardly $30 a month under this additional regulation." This is expected to appease the ex-service man and probably allay some of the hostility and the growing resentment that may have appeared in both bodies here on Capitol Hill.

Let me refer just once more to this hospitalization feature because those regulations will appear in the pages of the metropolitan press and the readers will say, "Well, what the devil does the ex-service man want now; has not the President been liberal; has he not given him additional hospitalization facilities; has he not given him an increase in pay?" And the undiscerning person, unfamiliar with the intricacies of veterans' regulations, will read these new regulations on the front pages of the newspapers and then consider the veteran an ingrate without analyzing just how far these new regulations go.

You remember what our President said before the American Legion Convention in Chicago. He stood there and said:

> No man, because he wore the uniform, shall be the special beneficiary of this Government.

To elaborate, he said that they must exhaust first of all every opportunity for local and State relief before they can knock on the door of the Federal Government and say, "Oh, Uncle Sam, please come to the rescue." What does he have to do even now under this extended regulation? He must virtually take an oath that he is a pauper. Mind you, the defenders of the Nation have got to go down and grovel abjectly in the dust and say, "Uncle Sam, I have been to the municipality where I was born and reared and they are out of money; I have been to the State where I was born and reared and to which I owe allegiance and they are out of money. They are out of relief funds; and so now I come, somehow sublimating all self-respect, and say I am a pauper; and now, please, Uncle Sam, will you aid me?"

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Will the gentleman please insert in the RECORD Theodore Roosevelt's statement?—

> War veterans have a greater claim upon us than any other class of our citizens.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I would gladly do it, but I may say to the gentleman from Minnesota that I prefer not to make a partisan issue of the desires of the veterans. That is not fair; why should they be sacrificed upon the altar of partisanship?

I yield to no one in my loyalty to the infirm man who sits in the White House and presides over the destinies of this Nation, but is that any reason why we cannot criticize if we honestly believe that we have not been securing justice for the defenders of the Nation, whose memories are sacred to every man who wore the uniform and soldiered for that flag over on the other side of the ocean? I do not want to bring Theodore Roosevelt into it, irrespective of what his opinion might have been.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. Will the gentleman not also add that General Hines was not a product of this side of the House?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I hold no brief for General Hines, I may say to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Does the $21,000,000 include anything for Spanish-American War veterans and their widows?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Yes; it provides for $15 per month where he has had 90 days' service and can show an honorable discharge, which, as a matter of fact, was no improvement over present regulations; and it also provides $15 per month where his service was less than 90 days and where he shows a 50-percent disability. The only thing that is changed over and above the old regulation is the fact that he does not have to show that he is 55 years of age. However, it does provide a little something additional for the Spanish War veteran, I should say.

I am kicking very particularly because it is such a meager response to the demands and to the needs of the veterans of the Nation, and I have a right to believe in my own heart that it is given as something of a sop to head off the growing revolt. But let me say to every Member in this Chamber if he thinks for a minute that the veterans of the country are simply going to supinely accept these little gratuities which fall like crumbs from the table to Lazarus, that he will be sadly mistaken. These piecemeal extensions will be the greatest incentive that the Nation's veterans ever had to fight for the things they deem just and right and to demand rather than petition in behalf of the widow, the orphan, the service-disabled veteran, and particularly for hospital treatment for the one whose disabilities are nonservice connected and who has no funds with which to pay for hospital treatment.

We made a survey of some hospitals in Illinois. There were 1,800 veteran patients. We found about 1 percent who had the money to pay for private care or for private hospital treatment.

When the body is torn with pain and anguish, what comfort is it to the man who wore the uniform to have Uncle Sam say: "I know how you languish and suffer; I know you have no money with which to have pain assuaged or secure adequate treatment, but what do I care? The war was fought 15 or 16 years ago and has become a second-hand memory to those of this generation, to be read of in history books and schoolbooks. I have forgotten all that, and you must find help the best you can, even though you may be one of the 10,000,000 or 11,000,000 who belong to the great distressed army of unemployed."

I want to summarize. I want this kept clearly in mind. Understand that these regulations that were issued Saturday do not put a single additional veteran, outside of a few Spanish-American War veterans, back upon the roll. They do not restore any of the $57,000,000 that was taken away under the Economy Act. It does nothing for the widows and orphans of the non-service-connected cases, the widows and orphans who are to be found on the highways and byways and who are in need. It does not enlarge any authority that the veterans have at the present time under existing regulations so far as hospitalization goes. So when you voice approval for that additional $21,000,000, be not misled that it will do anything material for the veterans.

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM].

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, it has been my pleasure on several occasions to speak in this Chamber concerning some of the unique and entrancing features of the history of Texas. The story of that Lone Star State is one of mutual interest to us all because its destiny as a Republic and as a State was wrought by citizens from all sections of the United States as the United States then existed. In the July 1933 number of the United States Naval Institute's proceedings appears an illuminating article by Mr. Robert Foster Carter with reference to the navy of Texas. In my judgment, the results of his research should be given wider publicity and included in the annals of our sea experiences. I can think of no more appropriate place for remarks concerning this article to be inserted than in the record of the proceedings of the House of Representatives in the consideration of the naval appropriation bill.

Texas has been governed under six different flags—those of France, Spain, Mexico, the Republic of Texas, the Southern Confederacy, and the United States. It is my purpose to speak of the navy of that great State, especially during the time when Texas was a Republic, because it was then and then only that it could have and maintain its own separate naval force.

In its experiences with Mexico, Texas had suffered many indignities. It looked to the ascendancy of Santa Ana as a source of relief from those indignities, but unfortunately the massacres and atrocities which followed his induction into office, and continued for many years, left those Texans, Americans from all sections of our land, in a worse condition than that which prevailed under the previous tyrant. This led, as you know, to their declaration of independence and to the subsequent establishment of that independence upon the field of battle.

In the latter part of 1835, Mexico, having rather a large navy for a country of its importance, because of the fact that although it had established its independence of Spain, the desire still lingered in the hearts of those of the mother country to recapture this great territory, sent out a Mexican vessel of war named the Correo Mexicana for the purpose of enforcing revenue laws. That vessel was sent to Anahuac on the Bay of Galveston, but the Englishman in charge of it soon overstepped his orders and his ship became a privateer. It made an attack upon the American brig Tremont, which was defenseless and which was engaged in unloading lumber at one of the ports on the Gulf. A Texan-owned ship, the San Felipe, flying, of course, the Mexican flag, went out to the relief of the Tremont. The San Felipe appeared to be an ordinary vessel of the sea, but when it turned about and disclosed its armament it was a veritable gunboat, and succeeded in conquering the Mexican vessel engaged in this piratical cruise.

About this time, Texas, because of the indignities heaped upon it, began to promote the establishment of its independence from Mexico, and shortly thereafter at San Jacinto, after the massacres at Golead and the Alamo, made that independence a positive fact. So Texas became a republic, and for 9 years it maintained that status.

One of the first acts of the Republic was to increase the naval forces which had been provided by the provisional government in 1835. In addition to this captured Mexican ship, the provisional government purchased four fighting schooners, the Liberty, the Independence, the Brutus, and the Invincible, small to be sure, but they proved their worth in many serious naval engagements. When the Republic was established, 10 or 15 additional ships were added to the naval force. But shortly thereafter and despite the fact that $280,000 had been appropriated for still other fighting vessels, the Congress of the Republic ordered the entire navy to be retired.

It so happened that for a time this could be done without serious consequence, because France, holding certain debts against the Mexican Government, blockaded its coast until the payment of those debts was insured. In 1839, when that blockade was lifted and Texas as a Republic again became menaced by Mexico, because it was always seeking to reclaim that vast empire as its own, Texas joined forces, morally at least, with Yucatan, which, following the example of Texas, sought also to establish its independence. Nominally, Texas could aid only morally by reason of the fact that commissioners were then in Mexico negotiating a treaty of peace, but that moral limit, sometimes overstepped, was of great interest and advantage to Yucatan and some funds were forthcoming from that country to help the Texans in maintaining their fleet. So the previous order of the Congress of the Republic to retire the navy was disregarded, and President Mirabeau B. Lamar, in a message to the Congress, made this significant statement, which I am sure will be interesting to such friends and colleagues of mine in the House as the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. VINSON] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN]:

> The naval equipments of a country, and especially of this country, are essentially different in the facility of their organization from the military power. Competent officers and soldiers to constitute an army may at any time be selected from the body of the population, but seamen and efficient naval officers are not to be found among a rural people; they belong to the element on which they serve, and are nurtured only on the ocean waves.

So by reason of the trouble in Yucatan, in which those people were aided and abetted by the moral support and the naval force of the Republic of Texas, the new Texan nation was saved from further encroachment by the Mexican Government.

Then came the third period in the history of the Texan Navy. In 1845, the Republic was admitted to the United States as a State of the American Union and, as showing the universality of the importance and interest of Texan history from an American standpoint, the man most responsible for that annexation was the last president of the Republic of Texas, Anson Jones, who hailed from Massachusetts. In my judgment, his policy of apparently and ostensibly seeking to join Texas either with France or with England as a dependency of one or the other country, led the United States to claim that vast domain as its own, and since that time it has been a State of the American Union.

When Texas entered the Union, it retained its land; but it ceded to the Union its Navy, with all the appurtenances thereunto appertaining, its fortifications, and its barracks; and a controversy then arose as to whether or not the officers went with the ships and thereby became officers of the American Navy. The sentiment in Congress, originally and primarily, was to the effect that they should become officers of the American Navy, but some of those of high rank in naval circles protested against this and formed an adverse lobby because of the fact that certain officers of the Texan Navy had formerly held much inferior rank in the American Navy, and they did not wish them transferred with the high rank to which they had ascended in the regime of Texas. As a consequence, the ships only, without the men, became a part of the Federal Navy, but in 1857 the Congress of the United States did recognize for the American Government the worth of the service which had been rendered and granted 5 years' pay to the officers of the Texas Navy. In addition to this, the Republic of Texas—and after Statehood the Legislature of Texas—gave certain financial and other recognition to these valiant men.

Though these ships were small, they contributed some very interesting chapters to the naval history of this country; and manned as they were by red-blooded Americans from every section of our land, they proved valiantly in many encounters the stern stock from which they sprang, winning victories over forces apparently overwhelming, just as they did on land when at San Jacinto a little handful of men under Gen. Sam Huston established the independence of Texas.

It is worthy of note in this connection that during the time the Texan Navy, which subsequently became a part of the Navy of the United States, was operating, Mexico was unable to land from its vessels one single soldier on Texas' shores or to unload supplies for its vastly more numerous army, but the ammunition and the various supplies sent by water to the Texan fighters from various parts of the United States arrived safely; and so, added to the great American triumphs on land in this Lone Star State, we have equally significant, although relatively unknown, triumphs by sea; and in view of the fact that from your section, whatever that section may be, brave men came to make these victories possible, and in view of the fact that the accomplishments of that small navy were American accomplishments, I thought it quite worth while to insert in our proceedings with reference to the naval appropriation bill this interesting bit of Texan and American history. [Applause.]

Mr. SWICK. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. SEGER].

Mr. SEGER. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the Committee, the gentleman from Illinois, answering a question today, agreed that an ocular demonstration is most effective to carry a point. I believe this is emphasized in a letter I have recently received from a Jerseyman anent the St. Lawrence waterway project. I believe it to be of interest to the House, and especially my colleague from New York, our minority leader, who is a leading exponent of this project and who last week rejected many of the arguments advanced against the waterway project by the Atlantic deeper waterways convention at Philadelphia, whose 500 delegates came from a territory embracing two thirds of our country's population and 80 percent of its taxpayers. My correspondent is Maj. Leslie E. Molineux, of Metuchen, N.J., and the theme of his epistle is: "We should keep our eyes open." The letter is short. I read it with your indulgence:

METUCHEN, N.J., January 16, 1934.

Hon. GEORGE N. SEGER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: An Associated Press dispatch reports that you oppose the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Deep Waterway Treaty. It is hoped that you will be successful in defeating it.

There are two strong natural obstacles to the project; fog and ice. Navigation from Montreal to Europe is difficult all of the year on account of fog in the long run down the St. Lawrence River to the open sea, some 800 to 1,000 miles. The port of Montreal is closed during the winter months on account of ice. Have these two objections been brought to the attention of the House Committee with the strength they deserve?

The story is told that years ago when the subject of a canal across the Isthmus was before Congress there was a strong difference of opinion whether the canal should be on Colombian or Nicaraguan territory. An objection was made to the latter on account of the liability of earthquakes and volcanic eruptions. This was ridiculed by the advocates of the Nicaraguan Canal. On the morning that the vote was to be taken in the House, each Congressman received a letter containing nothing but a Nicaraguan postage stamp. The stamp showed a volcano in full eruption. The vote following was in favor of Panama.

Photographs of the ice-bound port of Montreal would be of interest. We are learning more and more through the eyes.

Yours respectfully.

(Maj.) LESLIE E. MOLINEUX.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SEGER. I will.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. The gentleman understands that the fog is in the lower part of the St. Lawrence?

Mr. SEGER. I am not familiar with the locality; I am only giving you this letter.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Well, I will inform the gentleman that that is the case. The ice and fog are in the lower part of the St. Lawrence, and it has not prevented the use of that part of the St. Lawrence River for all these years. If that is true, why should the people tributary to the Lakes beyond Montreal be prevented from reaching the ocean?

Mr. SEGER. I have not the time to go into an argument with the gentleman, but I am in favor of an all-American canal.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, how much time has been used on each side?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas has used 2 hours and 1 minute, and the gentleman from New York has used 1 hour and 37 minutes.

Mr. SWICK. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED].

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman and members of the Committee, I have the honor to represent a district which has diversified interests. We have one section devoted to fruit growing and one section devoted largely to dairying. I am interested in any legislation that will bring relief to the dairymen.

The dairy farmers throughout the United States have been suffering from low prices for their products for several years. Federal relief has been extended to the producers of cotton, corn, wheat, rice, and tobacco.

The effort to assist the dairymen has been nullified in a large degree because of the imports of oils and fats which have displaced dairy products in the American market. The injury these imported oils and fats are inflicting on our domestic dairy products has been called to the attention of the Secretary of Agriculture; furthermore, extensive hearings have been held at which the dairy interests have appeared before the House Ways and Means Committee, and they have shown to what extent the imports are breaking down the dairy market.

Further delay in applying a remedy will endanger the effectiveness of the relief planned under the Agricultural Adjustment Act.

Before discussing the extent to which imports are affecting the dairy market, I wish to stress the importance of the dairy industry to the country as a whole.

There are 4,615,529 dairy farms in the United States. The total number of dairy cows in this country is 24,379,000, valued in 1932 at $965,758,000. The latest figures I have been able to obtain show that the value of dairy products per year in the United States aggregates $1,663,772,000. The investment of the dairymen of the United States in dairy cattle, dairy farms, and dairy machinery amounts to $6,135,887,000.

I am presenting these figures to show the magnitude of this particular farm activity with the hope of convincing the Secretary of Agriculture and the Members of this House as to the vital necessity of taking some action to protect this great farm industry from ruinous exploitation by foreign competition. I have the honor to represent a district in which the dairy industry is of paramount importance to the economic life of a very large area. To permit this industry to be destroyed by foreign competition would be a major disaster not only in the congressional district which I represent but also to the other dairy sections of the country.

Without going into great detail as to the rapid increase of competing imports from abroad, let me visualize the situation by reading these figures:

Imports

	Palm Oil	Coconut oil	Whale oil
	Pounds	Pounds	Pounds
1920	41,948,224	216,327,103
1925	139,178,587	2,333,174,452	55,495,290
1928	169,227,565	290,636,702	68,385,503
1931	258,144,600	325,174,560	139,692,757

These imports come from the tropical countries where labor receives only a few cents a day. There is no class of labor in this country that could possibly exist on such wages. Each of these commodities comes into direct competition with butter facts. To put our dairy farmer in competition with such labor at any time is indefensible and to do so when he is so hard pressed is to beat him over the head when he is down and out.

For years the dairy farmer has had to compete with the imported dairy products from Canada, Denmark, and New Zealand. Finally, the Hawley-Smoot Tariff Act greatly reduced this competition. It is to be hoped that the protection given under that tariff act will not be reduced or relaxed under any trade treaty.

There is a great surplus of dairy products in foreign countries seeking entrance into our market should the opportunity be offered. To permit the entrance of foreign butter, cheese, milk, and cream would mean to utterly destroy the last hope of the dairymen.

The rapid increase in the use of foreign fats and oils in this country is daily aggravating the desperate plight in which the American dairy farmer finds himself. [Applause.]

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REED of New York. Yes.

Mr. FISH. The gentleman is a distinguished member of the Committee on Ways and Means. Would it not be in order for his committee to consider placing an embargo on these oils and fats and substitutes for butter and dairy products?

Mr. REED of New York. As I understand the situation at present—and this has occurred within a very few days—the Secretary of Agriculture has appointed a committee in the Bureau of Economics dealing with dairy questions to consider the whole question and to determine just how far the Secretary of Agriculture can go under the present legislation to meet the situation. It is my opinion that he will find that he has not the power to give the relief which the dairymen desire. I believe it is imperative, if we are going to save the dairy industry from complete ruin through these imports, to take some action at this session of Congress.

Whether the Ways and Means Committee will feel that it can put on an embargo or whether it can put on some form of excise tax, the committee has not yet decided; but that legislation is sorely needed, there can be no question. Not only that, but take the men who are collecting the fats from the butcher shops all over the country. Their business is being ruined, and they buy direct from the farmer. I believe most of the Members here have received petitions and letters from that class. They take up a great deal of the fats and waste matter from the butcher shops. I have not given the whole picture. There is sesame oil imported from the Orient. The seeds are small, both white and black, and when pressed they yield at least half their weight in oil. It is an oil that does not become rancid, no matter how long it is kept. It comes into direct competition in various salads mixed with other oils, and the imports of sesame oil are increasing. Throughout Florida and many States of the South these seeds could be produced in great quantities, but it is utterly impossible to produce them with labor that receives as low a wage as labor is paid abroad. As a matter of fact these and many of the other oils, coconut oil, are produced by people who work for wages as low as 2 cents a day. Those people require practically no clothing, except possibly a breechclout; no shoes. They live on almost nothing; yet the farmers of this country, with our standard of living, are brought into direct competition with that cheap labor.

Mr. FISH. Has the gentleman's committee taken under consideration the danger to the dairy industry from the use of oleomargarine?

Mr. REED of New York. It has been called to the attention of the committee. I might say to the gentleman that in Canada during the war a law was passed prohibiting the manufacture of oleomargarine in Canada. That law is still in force. Not only that; they had a trade treaty with New Zealand and even modified that, because it was found that even New Zealand, some 2,000 miles away, was able to undercut the Canadian farmer by shipping dairy products into Canada.

Mr. FISH. Is it not a fact that oleomargarine is a considerable menace to the dairy industry?

Mr. REED of New York. There is no question about that, and that was brought out in the hearings before our committee. But that is not the whole picture. Some of the States are now producing sunflower seed in large quantities. Take also the matter of peanut oil. That is being menaced by these foreign cheap oils and seeds. Mind you, there was a tariff put on the seeds, but the hole that was left there was that foreign countries were able to bring in the seeds and press them out here. In the State of Minnesota, for instance, they have gone into the sunflower business in a large way. Russia has gone into that, and she is shipping her sunflower seed here at the present time in competition with our farmers.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REED of New York. Yes.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Is it not true that the cotton farmer of the South would also profit by an embargo on vegetable oil from the Philippines?

Mr. REED of New York. The gentleman is correct, and at this particular time the cottonseed-oil interests have appeared before the Ways and Means Committee and have shown the disaster that importation of oils is bringing to the cotton farmer. The cottonseed oil is the one cash item that a strictly cotton farmer gets from his crop. This competition is ruining his business, and they are joining with the dairy interests to get relief.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Does not the gentleman feel that the present effort to secure a reduction of acreage by paying the farmer is due to our leaving the sluiceways open for the entrance of competing products from abroad?

Mr. REED of New York. Absolutely, and the same is true in regard to the dairyman. Soon there will be a plan to reduce the amount of dairy products by limiting the amount each can produce; and pust as long as the foreign countries can ship in the things that will displace our dairy products, it is doomed to failure.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. As a matter of fact, what we are doing is to place a tax on the American consumer to subsidize agricultural production abroad.

Mr. REED of New York. Yes, and even more, because if we let them come into our market, they will disorganize our business at home and we may never get it back again.

Mr. HART. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REED of New York. Yes.

Mr. HART. Up to the time of the passage of the Fordney-McCumber Act was there not a restriction upon duty-free fats and oils from the Philippines?

Mr. REED of New York. Not to my knowledge. Permit me to say to the gentleman that the one and only hope the dairyman has had during the whole depression has been the high duty placed upon dairy products of foreign countries. Were it not for that, Canada would simply have flooded us with dairy products. Dairy imports would have come from Denmark and New Zealand. I want you to remember this: They can ship butter from New Zealand into New York or into San Francisco at less cost, as far as transportation rates are concerned, than they can ship it from Wisconsin to New York.

Mr. HART. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. REED of New York. I yield.

Mr. HART. Was there not also a restriction on the importation of sugar, duty free, from the Philippine Islands until the passage of the Fordney-McCumber Act?

Mr. REED of New York. I am not familiar with that, and I am not concerned about it.

Mr. HART. We are, out in Michigan.

Mr. REED of New York. What I am concerned about is this, that there is a group of islands not far from the Philippine Islands where they have been raising spices. They have now found it more profitable to ship their oils to this country, so they have displaced thousands of acres of spice lands and are putting in the coconuts. In the Philippine Islands they are developing coconut growing at an alarming rate. A coconut tree will produce a hundred pounds of coconuts per year. They cost very little to plant. They will come into bearing in 5 or 6 years. Unless we stop this thing now it will get such a hold that our dairymen will be ruined.

The Federal Government has spent millions of dollars to eradicate bovine tuberculosis. In my particular district they have cooperated until our herds are practically all certified herds. That has been expensive. They have fine barns; they have the dairy machinery; they have been a prosperous lot of people, but today they are confronted with ruin because of these importations.

Mr. HART. I am a dairy producer.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED] has again expired.

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. KLEBERG. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REED of New York. I yield.

Mr. KLEBERG. I would like to ask my distinguished colleague whether it has ever occurred to him that possibly this whole business of the tariff may have brought us into the position which now confronts us, not only with reference to the Philippine Islands, the Virgin Islands, the isle of Guam, and other countries where we have at one time or another exercised what might be called a protectorate.

Mr. REED of New York. If I had my way and were to establish a policy for this Government, the tariff would not be as low as it is now. It would be higher, and we would live more within ourselves than we are at the present time. I do not believe the tariff has brought about this situation at all.

Mr. KLEBERG. I do not believe my friend got exactly what I was driving at. The suggestion of a tariff, or rather the use of the word tariff, in the first place, in my opinion, might possible have been an error. In my opinion, a nation should be willing to pay contribution toward the support of a market in any other country which they seek to use, just as one who sets up a market place and offers stalls for rent expects the individual or agency that uses one of those stalls to pay for it. In the case of a tariff structure, we cannot ask a contribution from the Philippines, because we cannot tax, through a tariff, those who are under our protection, if you please.

Mr. REED of New York. I will say to the gentleman that I voted for Philippine independence. That is one reason, and only one of several, why I voted for it, because I wanted to protect our farming interests. I believe if they come into our market they should pay for the use of it, but there is no reason for their coming here at all with their fats and oils.

Mr. KLEBERG. Suppose we were to change this tariff set-up that we have in this country and proceed to establish a policy where all nations are invited to use our markets, provided they pay the fixed overhead and charges which our producers are called upon to meet and contribute a little additional to the support of those markets?

Mr. REED of New York. I believe we can supply all of our needs along dairy lines from our own farms in this country if we will protect this market as we go along.

Mr. KLEBERG. The gentleman would not agree to a policy whereby you can call upon any nation to pay the fixed charges and a little additional, for the use of these markets?

Mr. REED of New York. I would make it so hard that it would be practically an embargo.

Mr. KLEBERG. We are not talking about what we would make it. We are talking about a policy. We could expect a contribution from every country in that way, including the Philippines, and so forth. To explain my thought: If we could throw overboard and do away with what we call "our tariff policies" and set up a policy in its stead which would provide that all countries outside of continental United States would be called upon to contribute toward the maintenance of our markets—markets that are erected and maintained by our Government for our people, and paid for by our people—other countries should, if the use of our markets by them is desired, be willing to meet the overhead fixed charges and cost of production to our producers by contributing in accordance with them toward the maintenance of such markets as well as paying the additional burdens which their added use of the market brings about. While this would in effect in most cases be the same in effect as some of our tariffs, still the idea of embargo is not of the essence.

Mr. REED of New York. I will follow any policy that will keep our markets for the dairymen of this country.

Mr. WEARIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REED of New York. I yield.

Mr. WEARIN. Can the gentleman give the House any information as to what percentage of fats and oils that are being imported into the United States at the present time now come from the Philippine Islands and our various island possessions?

Mr. REED of New York. I gave the amount that is coming in. I cannot give the exact percent. I did not go into that detail here. It is all disclosed in the hearings. Later on I shall go into the details further, when time will permit. There is talk that this session of Congress will not last very long. We are setting up codes for the dairymen and doing things to aid him. The only thing is to take action in time so that they are not allowed to push in boatload after boatload of these oils and fats and put down the man we are trying to aid.

Mr. WEARIN. Does not the gentleman think, however, that the policy with reference to limitations on oils depends a good deal upon the percentage of them that comes from our island possessions?

Mr. REED of New York. Yes; undoubtedly it does.

Now, discussing this question a little further, from the viewpoint of these other countries, let us consider the situation in Denmark. Denmark has a very great surplus of butter at the present time. Butter is strictly an article of export in Denmark. Through their cooperatives they make oleomargarine and the farmers eat oleomargarine to have more butter to export. They can sell their butter on our market in New York at a transportation rate which is about equal to the rail transportation rate from western New York to New York City, and this gives them a great advantage.

Let us consider also the situation in New Zealand. In New Zealand are three islands well adapted to the raising of cattle. It is not necessary to house the cattle, for the climate is very mild. There is an abundance of moisture in that country. That makes it ideal for producing hay. They raise all sorts of turnips and herbs that the cattle eat. It is strictly an export country and its government goes throughout the world spending literally hundreds of thousands of dollars a year advertising their products, setting up their stores wherever they can. Fortunately, they cannot get into our market at the present time, because the tariff keeps them out.

While we have kept these exporting nations out, I still appeal to the Members to consider the facts with regard to the quantity of oils coming in. The testimony of the dairy interests is to the effect that imported oils are breaking down the price of dairy products in this country.

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REED of New York. I yield.

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Would the gentleman be interested to know that the butter that is being used by our Army, by our Navy, and by the Government establishment in the Panama Canal Zone comes from New Zealand instead of from our own country?

Mr. REED of New York. I thank the gentleman for his contribution.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. SWICK. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. CHRISTIANSON].

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Mr. Chairman, I am sure most of the Members of this House will remember a story which they read in their youth, Charles Lamb's Dissertation Upon Roast Pig. One day a Chinaman went away from home, leaving the house in charge of his young son. The boy was careless with fire, with the result that the building burned down. After the flames had wrought their work of destruction the boy remembered his favorite pig which had been kept in the house. Concerned for its welfare and safety he went to the smoking ruins saw the pig, grabbed it by a leg to rescue it from the flames. He burned his fingers and put them in his mouth. For the first time a Chinaman had discovered how tasty and delectable roast pig may be, and from that time on almost every day some Chinaman's house burned down.

This afternoon, when I heard the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER], who is a member of the Committee on Appropriations, make certain statements about the effort to cure unemployment by engaging in public works, I recalled this story; and the question arose in my mind whether we are not much like the Chinamen who burned their houses down to get roast pig.

For instance, the gentleman told us that it costs the United States Government $5,400 to keep one man employed 1 year at constructing public buildings. It seems to me the time has come when the Congress should begin to consider very seriously whether its attempt to relieve unemployment by the very expensive and extravagant method of erecting bigger and finer post offices and courthouses is justified, and whether we are making the money go as far as it should. I am strongly of the opinion that too large a proportion of the $3,300,000,000 we appropriated for public works during the special session will enrich contractors and material men instead of buying bread, fuel, and shelter for the hungry men and women of America.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. I yield.

Mr. FISH. From what the gentleman says, it seems apparent to me that the policy of the administration has been to save a few drops at the spigot but to open up the bunghole to a flood of expenditures which have not served any too good purpose. Is not that what the gentleman believes?

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Answering the gentleman from New York, I will say that it is not my purpose to direct any attack against the administration. I believe in Franklin D. Roosevelt. His objectives are, in the main, my own, and I have voted for most of the measures he has sponsored. When policies miscarry, when they fail to bring the beneficial results anticipated, let us as Members of Congress admit our share in the responsibility. I did not vote for the public-works program for the reason that England's experience had proved that it would fail as a means of unemployment relief and for the reason that it would put a heavy burden upon the taxpayer and therefore operate as a brake on industry. I did not vote for it because I feared that labor would get only the crumbs that fell from the table. However, with all my misgivings as to the P.W.A., I believe thoroughly in the C.W.A. I believe in it because it relieves distress and makes it possible for millions of people to eat and to provide themselves with clothes, fuel, and shelter. I believe in it for the reason that it puts almost every cent of every dollar of money expended by the Government into the hands of men who will at once put it into circulation.

In fact, my purpose in rising was to say that we should now take some of the P.W.A. money that has been allotted for public works, available on July 1 of this year, money which it is proposed to use for erecting buildings of doubtful necessity and utility, and definitely withdraw it, and recognizing the duty of Congress to share with the administration the responsibility of government, reallocate it to C.W.A. work, so that the millions who are living on C.W.A. funds at this time may continue to have employment, at least until the snow leaves the ground.

In Minnesota the situation is serious. We live in a northern climate. Winters are long. Our people have to burn coal often until the first of May; and the Federal Government must not, it cannot afford, to discontinue giving them and others in similar circumstances the opportunity to earn a living, to provide the necessities of life, between now and that time. I do not know the situation in the South. Spring comes earlier there, and the most urgent need will therefore end sooner; but I do know that in my section of the country, and I have been informed that in New England, in fact, in all the States of the North, a very serious condition will arise unless C.W.A. work is continued, and it is the duty of this Congress to provide the means whereby it may be continued. I deny that this is exclusively the responsibility of the President of the United States; it is our responsibility too, and unless adequate funds are reallocated within the next week I would suggest that the Committee on Appropriations should bring in a bill authorizing and directing such reallocation or providing other funds by which C.W.A. work may be continued.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. I yield.

Mr. BYRNS. Of course, the gentleman realizes that in the construction of public buildings and the prosecution of river and harbor works and these various activities that are going on, it is necessary to purchase material and this alone carries with it an unnamed number of men who are engaged in the fabrication of the material used. So the number of men employed cannot be confined simply to those who are actually upon the Government pay rolls.

No one has a higher respect for the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] than I, nor greater confidence in him; but I myself am not prepared to admit that his figures are entirely correct with reference to the amount of money needed to put one man to work on these various projects.

May I say also, if the gentleman will pardon me, with reference to his suggestion that the Appropriations Committee should get to work and allocate these funds, the gentleman knows very well that were such a practice followed it would entail not only unlimited delay with reference to the expenditure of the funds, but all over the country would go up the cry of pork-barrel methods. It would be difficult to keep that out of the picture if Congress undertook to allocate the funds in the manner suggested by the gentleman from Minnesota and the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SWICK. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. I will say in answer to the distinguished majority leader that, in my opinion, if an outcry came against allocating P.W.A. funds to the C.W.A., it would come from those throughout this country who are interested in pork, not from those whose interest is in giving workingmen employment. In fact, the very thing I proposed was to take some courthouses and post-office buildings out of the pork barrel and reallocate the money so that it may be used to relieve distress at this time, when such relief is sorely needed.

Answering the gentleman's question whether I know that in the erection of public buildings others besides those who lay one brick upon another get employment, I will say that I am very well aware of that fact. Of course, there must be factories to produce the raw material. Structural steel must be manufactured; stone must be cut and fabricated; portland cement must be made. But I have visited portland-cement factories and have found that the whole process of manufacturing cement is mechanical. A few men can turn out enough cement for construction involving the expenditure of hundreds of thousands of dollars. I know that in the limestone quarries of Indiana most of the work is done by machines. I know that mechanization has been developed to the *n*th degree in the steel mills of Cleveland, Pittsburgh, and Gary. If it is our desire that the money we have appropriated shall be spent in such a way as to give the maximum relief to the workingmen whom we profess to wish to aid, I suggest that we see to it that the money is so used that as many cents as possible of every dollar shall go to buy bread, shelter, and fuel.

In that connection let me add that, insofar as it is advisable to spend money for public works to relieve unemployment, I believe it should be spent for roads rather than for public buildings, because, according to the statement of the distinguished minority member of the Appropriations Committee, in road work it does not cost more than $2,400 a year to keep a man employed. I would also make the suggestion that if we are sincere in our profession that it is our purpose in appropriating money for public works to provide the necessaries of life for workingmen and their families. we might consider taking some of the machinery off the road jobs and returning to the process of building roads by methods that will require more manual labor. I think the money we appropriate for unemployment relief should go not to the owners of machines but to men who will use it to support their families.

The great need of this country is not for more and finer post offices and courthouses. We are overbuilt now. We are erecting post offices at crossroad villages that represent an investment several times what any corporation would regard as a prudent investment for housing a business of equal volume. We do not need buildings, but we do need relief for unemployment. Municipalities and counties, and even States, have reached the end of their resources. They are not able to provide more funds, and the only place they can come is to the Federal Government. Personally, I oppose pork. I oppose the bootstrap-lifting process of enriching ourselves by spending money unnecessarily. But to relieve distress I would vote the last dollar out of the Treasury of the United States. I would vote to exhaust its credit if necessary to provide the means of livelihood for the American people, for that is our responsibility. We cannot shirk it. What we should have is less pork for politicians, more relief for the people.

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. I want my colleague from Minnesota to understand that I am not against appropriating money for the C.W.A. work.

I believe that the C.W.A. is the one Federal appropriation that should be made immediately so that the millions of persons now engaged in C.W.A. projects can feel secure that their jobs will be safe. This work-relief project has been a boon to business in rural and urban Minnesota, and I am for it. I do say that the appropriations should be made, and I understand such appropriation has already been made for the completion of the post offices contemplated in the State of Minnesota. The post office at the city where the gentleman lives has already been finished. It cost nearly $5,000,000. There is one in the city of St. Paul costing just about that amount. I want to ask the gentleman if the people of my district and the people of the rest of the State of Minnesota should not have just about the same rights and privileges as you have in the cities of Minneapolis and St. Paul?

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. I will say to my colleague that I was not a Member of Congress when the Minneapolis post office was authorized, nor have I ever advocated its erection, despite the fact that it is in my city. Frankly, I have questioned, as have many citizens of Minneapolis, whether it was a necessary expenditure of public money at a time when our resources should be used for relieving distress. In any pork which the gentleman may get in any forthcoming appropriation bill, let me say that I am not at all interested. I am surprised at his admission that he is interested, if that is the meaning he intended to convey.

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. RAMSAY].

Mr. RAMSAY. Mr. Chairman, I want to pay my meed of respect and appreciation for the vision and courage of the man of the hour that has instilled new hope and new confidence in the hearts of the people in these States.

In the first message the President of the United States gave to the American people after his election, he said he did not expect to make a home run every time he came to the bat. Since that time, he has taken many healthy swings at the ball, but no pitcher on the team of panic and oppression has been able to slip over even a strike.

I want to praise the wisdom and humanity that instigated the law which took 250,000 boys from the streets, from the pool rooms and dens of iniquity, and placed them on the broad highway of work and opportunity that will later pour them into the marts and trades of the United States, adding new impulse to the business ability and activity of the great American industries.

I also want to thank God for the vision that gave us the N.R.A.—the great keystone of the triumphant arch of the new deal that struck the shackles of industrial slavery from the children of America and turned their faces toward the little red schoolhouse on the hill, where they may learn the history and traditions of a great Nation.

It also revived from ruins and chaos the great industries of America that lay prostrate and helpless from their own folly. It has restored 6,000,000 men to labor and employment and given them a new hope and new confidence in the institutions of this Government. It has given to the laboring man for the first time in the history of any nation the right to bargain and deal for the sale of his only product—his labor.

Someone on the other side of the aisle has said "What about the cost of it all? How are we ever going to pay it back?" We will pay it back by the restoration of business; by the placing of every man in the United States in work and employment at a fair and living wage that will enable him to pay back to the Government a stream of taxes exacted by fair and just laws that will lift the deficit as rapidly as it was placed upon the people in America. And even though it takes years to repay it all back, is it not better to restore confidence in the Government of this country in the breast of the average citizen and restore to him the right to live and raise his family in an orderly and decent manner?

Mr. Chairman, the civilization of this country will not permit us to turn back. Civilization is progressive. Each generation has its rear rank and its front rank, but the march of progress goes steadily onward toward the evolution of God's final purpose. The rear rank of one generation takes its stand upon the ground that was once occupied by the front rank of a former generation, and front rank of the new generation takes its stand far beyond the ken of men of days gone by.

Time was—and not many generations ago—when ordinary men like you and I were considered as mere pawns to be used and cast aside by a man who lived across the seas, who wore a coronet on his brow and held a scepter in his hand. To him the life and welfare of the common man meant nothing. To the common man life held no bright future, no bright promise to lure him on to noble thoughts and valorous achievements. But, thank God, the best spirit of the world has changed though the eternal battle of life still rages, though the strong continue to oppress the weak. Tears are shed and blood is spilled; yet above the din of strife, above the clash of arms—now strong, now weak, but ever growing more distinct—there comes a harmony of a sweet refrain. It is the world's front rank; it is that mighty advance guard of civilization as it pours forth that wondrous melody, that song of songs—"Equal Rights to All and Special Privileges to None." [Applause.]

Mr. SWICK. Mr. Chairman, I yield 9 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SHOEMAKER].

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Mr. Chairman, we have heard a lot said here today about the Navy and about bringing it up to the navies of some of the countries of the rest of the world and about spending a lot of money for weapons of destruction, but I have heard very little said here in favor of doing something that is really constructive.

Under this bill $295,418,188 is proposed, and added to that is $278,000,000 of so-called "Public Works funds", which make a total of $573,418,188 to be spent for the purpose of destruction and not construction.

The Kaiser, for many, many years, propagated the idea that preparedness was the thing that was going to save Germany, and then we had a war to do away with militarism, and, after all was said and done, Germany won. We had a great war for democracy, and all we got out of it was prohibition, influenza, Herbert Hoover, and a depression [laughter], and we are still paying those war debts. This not only got us into this depression but it has put the entire world in a depression, and here we are going to squander money with the rest of the world to fix ourselves up to be in a position so we can have bigger and better and nobler and greater wars and create more catastrophes and cause more destruction; and we try at the same time to call ourselves civilized.

We argue about more men for the Navy, more man power for destruction. I want to say to you that up through the Northern States we have what is known as the "potato-soup line"—little children who are living upon potato soup—potatoes and water; and, thanks to the good Lord, the springs are still running or they might not have the soup—these little potbellies, with sprawly, scrawly limbs and trembling knees—and down through the South we have the scurvy brigade. Our little children are suffering from malnutrition and want of food. There are over 2,000,000 of these little waifs, according to the Department of Labor, who are now out of school, with no shoes and no clothing, with teachers by the thousands being laid off. Many of these teachers are walking the streets unemployed after putting in a lifetime and a small fortune, and, in many instances, a large fortune, into an education so that they might teach our boys and girls of this great land.

Not only this, there are hundreds of millions of dollars in salaries owing at the present time to school teachers, and so religiously and so generously do they give of their time that they go on teaching these little children.

Oh, we talk about men for the Navy. Are you going to make sailors and soldiers out of the potato-soup line of the North or the scurvy line of the South? I want to say to you that this big Navy program is for the purpose of following the American dollar and for the purpose of backing up national imperialism abroad. This is what this is for. It is about time for this Congress to come back to the plans and principles of George Washington, who advised against foreign entanglements and advised us to stay home and take care of our own business.

O Mr. Chairman, how long are we going to allow this suffering to continue? We are appropriating $573,418,188 so that we can go through one more holacaust of hell such as we went through in the late World War, and do it over again.

William Randolph Hearst goes out here and hires people to take pictures of some Japs taking a picture of some old horse out here on a road in New Jersey and plays it up in big headlines to fan the flames and try to get our jingoes to go wild here on the floor of Congress. We are going to protect the Philippines, the Hawaiian Islands, and various other possessions in foreign countries, but I believe it is our first duty to protect the children of America, and once again open the door of opportunity which has been closed to them by organized greed, graft, and concentrated wealth in America.

I believe the time has come when if J. Pierpont Morgan wants an army, we should let him recruit his own army and go ahead. The last time we had a war he sent Gen. Hugh S. Johnson over here to run the American World War by having him write up the Draft Act for General Crowder, so we could draft the young manhood of the country into the United States Army to fight for J. Pierpont Morgan. This is the same General Johnson who is drafting the N.R.A. code to protect the House of Morgan and the grafters and the gluttons of gold in this country of ours. Is it not about time that the American people woke up to what is going on and what is being done to them?

Oh, in our State the people are beginning to realize that the only difference between the Republican Party and the Democratic Party is that one of them is a carbunkle and the other is a boil, and both of them are the tools of big business—the gold-dust twins of Wall Street. This is why they send a few of us Farmer-Laborites down here.

Today, in the interest of big business, we are going to rob the suffering children of America and deny them future education; rob our patient, energetic, and religiously sincere school teachers, who follow their profession with such zest that they are compelled to forfeit their future wages so we can build up a navy—build up an instrument of destruction to protect the gods of gold and the gods of mammon.

I want to say to you that if we proceed in the manner in which we are going it will not be long when these two old political parties of the United States, who represent property rights, will be sunk into oblivion, and the great American people will step forward into a political party that represents the human rights of mankind, and we will once more return to the kind of government that we were originally intended to be when we divorced ourselves from the Crown of England and established a government by and for the people, which has now been stolen. [Applause.]

Mr. SWICK. Mr. Chairman, I am today introducing in the House the American Legion's clarified 4-point bill as substitute for H.R. 6215, which I introduced on January 3, 1934, at the request of Otto F. Messner, commander of the Pennsylvania State department of the American Legion and the vice chairman of the American Legion national legislative committee.

The fact that the President signed four Executive orders yesterday which it is said will restore approximately $21,092,205 annually to veterans and their dependents, is in my opinion an admission on the part of the administration that it acted hastily and unmercifully when it determined on the drastic cuts provided in the Economy Act and subsequent regulations issued by the President.

It now admits that veterans suffering from nonservice diseases requiring emergency or extended care, who are unable to pay for such treatment, should be hospitalized in veterans' hospitals where facilities are available. If that is so now, and I think it is, I cannot understand what conditions have been unearthed since the enactment of the Economy Act that were not known before that would prompt this change in the opinions of the Director of the Budget and others responsible for the order. Can they by Executive order bring back those men who have died because of their previous action through lack of medical treatment, or allay the sufferings of those denied such treatment during the past 9 months?

The President by his orders increases from $90 to $100 per month the pensions to veterans suffering from total permanent service-connected disability, with proportionate increases for lesser disabilities. I cannot help wondering what conditions have changed during the past 9 months that would justify this change of heart. Certainly it cannot be an increased cost of living, which the President denies in his statement denying pay increases.

The Executive order issued yesterday also indicates a change of heart toward veterans of the Spanish-American War, no longer requiring proof of service connection. What information has been received since the enactment of the Economy Act that would cause this order?

Can it be possible that the administration leaders recognize the justness of the Legion's 4-point bill and believe the Members of Congress will insist upon its enactment? Is this change of heart simply designed to defeat favorable consideration of the Legion's program, which proposes to restore eligibility for service-connected disabilities, with actual monetary payments that existed prior to March 20, 1933, with the exception of veterans enlisting after the armistice, where the Government can prove disability occurred before or after service or where service connection had been established by fraud, error, or misrepresentation? The bill would restore hospitalization privileges in the same manner approved by the President yesterday. It would further provide pensions for widows and orphans in need on the same rates and conditions provided for the Spanish-American War under the Economy Act.

I have served on the World War Veterans' Legislative Committee and the Pensions Committee since coming to Congress and have been confronted with the legislative programs of the American Legion and other organizations at various times. I have not always been able to accept them in their entirety, but I believe the 4-point program provided in this bill is the best and most conservative legislation ever proposed by a veterans' organization; it does not repeal the Economy Act nor restore non-service-connected disability compensation. It has the authority of years of experience in veterans' problems behind it and is deserving of the favorable consideration of this Congress. It will restore benefits to those who are justly entitled to them, with the assurance that they will not be disturbed by the whims of individuals not informed on the subject.

It is estimated that the maximum cost of this bill would be $80,000,000 a year, and in the opinion of the Legion it will not cost more than $65,000,000 a year, or about the cost of the C.W.A. program for 1 week. As one who supported the President's economy bill, believing that veterans would be dealt with with justice and mercy, I think the enactment of this bill is the only way we can rectify the unjustified reductions made in veterans' benefits by the powers granted the President at that time.

The vice chairman of the national legislative committee of the American Legion, Col. John Thomas Taylor, informed me today that the recent Executive orders were not satisfactory and would not cause a lessening in the Legion's demand for enactment of this bill.

I yield, Mr. Chairman, 10 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. WELCH].

Mr. WELCH. Mr. Chairman, I desire at this time to pay my respects and compliments to the distinguished occupant of the White House, President Franklin D. Roosevelt, also to his far-sighted and competent Secretary of the Navy, Hon. Claude A. Swanson. In their determination to restore to this country an adequate Navy, they are carrying out the policy of one of the greatest Americans in history, Theodore Roosevelt, who, as Assistant Secretary of the Navy and as President of the United States and as a citizen and patriot, never wavered in his demand for preparedness and the necessity for a Naval Establishment of the first magnitude.

In 1903, President Theodore Roosevelt dedicated the Naval Memorial Monument in Union Square in San Francisco. His words of dedication still linger in the minds and memory of those of us who were present on that occasion:

It is eminently fitting—

Said he then—

that there should be here in this great city on the Pacific Ocean a monument to commemorate the deed which showed once for all that America had taken her position in the Pacific. * * * To dedicate the monument would be an empty and foolish thing if we accompanied it by an abandonment of our national policy of building up the Navy. * * * Applaud the Navy and what it has done. That is first-class. But make your applause count by seeing to it that the Navy is so built up that the men of the next generation will have something to applaud also.

The Nation must have physical no less than moral courage; the capacity to do and dare and die at need and that grim and steadfast resolution which alone will carry a great people through a great peril. * * * Diplomacy is utterly useless when there is no force behind it; * * * an ignoble peace is even worse than an unsuccessful war. We ask for an armament fit for the Nation's needs, not primarily to fight, but to avoid fighting. Peace, like freedom, is not a gift that tarries long in the hands of cowards or of those too feeble or too short-sighted to deserve it, and we ask to be given the means to insure that honorable peace which alone is worth having. * * *

There is no more utterly useless and even utterly mischievous citizen, than the peace-at-any-price, universal-arbitration type of being, who is always complaining, either about war or else about the cost of armaments which act as the insurance against war. In the present stage of civilization a proper armament is the surest guarantee of peace and is the only guarantee that war, if it does come, will not mean irreparable and overwhelming disaster. The huckster or pawnbroker type is usually physically timid and likes to cover an unworthy fear of the most just war under high-sounding names. The large mollycoddle vote * * * consists of the people who are soft physically and morally or who have a twist in them which makes them cantankerous and unpleasant as long as they can be so with safety to their bodies. In addition there are the good people with no imagination and no foresight who think war will not come, but that if it does come, armies and navies can be improvised. I abhor unjust war; I believe that war should never be resorted to when or so long as it is honorably possible to avoid it. I advocate preparation for war in order to avert war, and I should never advocate war unless it were the only alternative to dishonor. * * * There is no surer way of courting national disaster than to be opulent, aggressive, and unarmed.

Mr. Chairman and Members of the Committee, why, may I ask, in this time of unemployment and depression, is there wisdom in constructing unneeded public buildings and folly in building an adequate Navy? [Applause.]

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. HENNEY].

Mr. HENNEY. Mr. Chairman and Members of the Committee, I was particularly interested in the remarks of the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] this morning in which he, while discussing the appropriations to the Naval Department, stated, in substance, that outside of the four hundred millions used in civil-works projects and allocated out of the three billion four hundred million public-works appropriation a too small proportion of the balance actually went to direct labor. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that, barring the element of graft, or, to use an everyday colloquialism, chiseling, precisely the same percentage of expended funds go to labor in the erecting of public buildings and bridges and constructing battle cruisers as would be possible in the regular C.W.A., C.C.C., or other recognized hand-labor programs, allowing, of course, for the higher wage differential for skilled labor, such as masons, steelworkers, architects, engineers, and so forth, whose services are technical and whose positions cannot be filled by the ordinary pick-and-shovel laborer. The building of, say one of the large governmental buildings in Washington, returns to labor by far the larger portion of the money expended. Leaving out the actual cost of the raw materials in their crude state and deducting the profits to contractors, which, Mr. Chairman, I deplore as having been far and away too lucrative in the past, and which I hope and verily believe in the future under the wise guidance of our great President will be reduced to a minimum—every cent of the balance goes to labor. Take, for instance, a modern road-building project, in which formerly possibly three or four hundred laborers per mile were employed. Today a contractor will move in with a steam shovel, operated by one or two men, and 8 or 10 caterpillar dump trucks and do twice as much work in grading and surfacing a road as the whole three or four hundred hand laborers.

But, Mr. Chairman, it takes hundreds of workers to build these steam shovels, tractors, cement mixers, and so forth. It requires hundreds of men in the mines and in the smelters to produce the steel. Men are employed on the railroads to transport the machines and the cement. Then, again, men are employed in the forests to supply lumber for the freight cars, railroad ties, and so forth. It calls for men to supply gasoline and transport it; men to build power dams or mine coal to produce electricity used in welding and for power to construct machinery; men to mine and kiln the cement and to dig and transport gravel; and because these men are not out on that particular stretch of road building we are told that there is little direct labor employed; and yet were it not for road building, public and private building, thousands and thousands of men in lumber camps, in mines, on railroads, in machine shops, and in power plants would be thrown out of employment.

And again I submit, Mr. Chairman, that outside of the cost of crude materials such as iron, granite, gravel, and so forth, in its raw state, every penny ultimately goes back to labor and is put into circulation, increasing the purchasing power of the masses whether in one form of public works or another. In the last analysis the money that is being expended is going to the people who need it and who will spend it at the bottom of the economic pyramid and where it will revive the small business man, the country banker, and the professional men and artisans of every hamlet, village, and city in our land. This is not a program of redistribution of wealth, but it is a revaluation of human opportunities and in keeping with our great President's expressed desire that men and women must be paid decent and livable wages. In this connection I have felt that the cost-of-living index during the past 6 months has increased much more than the Department of Labor's figures have shown. This I have adduced from the increased cost of commodities that we purchase in our own homes. Personally I believe they are increased well above 25 percent, and, therefore, I have been particularly interested in the rural carriers of the Postal Department and the postal railway-mail clerks. These men have not only had the regular 15-percent economy cuts but with their furloughs of 2 weeks every 3 months they have had an additional 16⅔-percent cut. Then in the case of the rural carriers, their maintenance for equipment was cut from 4 cents per mile to 1 cent per mile, 2 cents of which was later remitted to them, making a total of 3 cents per mile or, on the basis of a 30-mile route, 90 cents per day. In starting and stopping their automobiles every few hundred yards, letting their engines idle while making deliveries, and traveling much of the time in first and second gear, I submit, Mr. Chairman, that this will little more than pay for gas and oil or, figuring on another basis, 90 cents per day for 300 days per year amounts to $270 per year, which is to pay for gasoline, oil, tires, chains, repairs, license fee, insurance, and exchange depreciation on their cars each year, to say nothing of livery hire that those carriers who live in snow-bound States are obliged to pay for 3 or 4 months out of each year.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter which I received from Mr. G. F. Bartelt, president of the Wisconsin Rural Letter Carriers' Association, together with a survey made by his association of the status of rural carriers' expenses in the great State of Wisconsin, which I have the honor of representing as one of its Representatives in the Seventy-third Congress. These statistics and conclusions are startling in what they show and are conclusive proof that this branch of the service, to use modern slang, is "getting the worst of it." I hope our Postmaster General, who, I am glad to say, is giving one of the best administrations of that Department in many years, will see fit to rectify some of the inequities that now exist. Certainly, there will not be much gained by way of rigid economy in this Department, which costs the Government approximately $30,000,000 per year as against the extravagant, wasteful, and high-binding subsidies that go to the holders of air mail and ocean mail contracts, in which the subsidies alone are equal to the entire cost of the rural-delivery system. The hearings that are now taking place before the Senate committee show conclusively one of the reasons for the huge deficit that has existed in the Post Office Department in the past; and I, for one, believe that the small saving that can be brought about by pinching the rural carriers, as well as the city carriers, postal railway clerks, and so forth, is infinitesimal when compared to other departmental leaks that have existed in the past. It is the old adage of saving at the spigot and wasting at the bunghole, and I truly believe that when Postmaster General Farley has completed his program of repair, that all these leaks will be stopped and the lowly carrier will come into his own.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

I append the following letters:

WISCONSIN RURAL LETTER CARRIERS ASSOCIATION,
Marathon, Wis., January 15, 1934.

Hon. CHARLES W. HENNEY,
Member of Congress, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. HENNEY: It is with a great deal of disappointment that I read of the recent Presidential order continuing the 15-percent reduction in salaries of Government employees for another 6 months.

Let me say that the rural carriers have taken the reduction in salary without complaint; we have taken it in a true American spirit, ready to do our bit in assisting to wipe out the deficit in the Post Office Department; however, we were allowed to hope that such reduction would be but of short duration, we have looked forward to January 1934 hoping that at this time at least a partial restoration in salary would be made. We fear to face the next 6 months with this continued reduction, for we have learned by sad experience that it is impossible to maintain a balanced budget with the present salary.

I believe that of all Government employees the rural carriers are in the worst predicament, although it may seem that the total salary paid is sufficient, the amount is far from being net to the carrier, after paying the expense necessary to render service, there is but a very meager amount left from which it is impossible to maintain our household, at least not according to the American standard of living.

I am enclosing herewith a summary of a survey recently taken among a number of rural carriers in Wisconsin, from all sections of the State. This will give to you a true picture of the average rural carrier and his condition of labor. I sincerely hope that these figures will be of interest to you and worthy of your careful consideration.

Let me respectfully call your attention to a few of the items. You will note that many of the roads over which rural carriers travel are still unsurfaced; in fact, many miles of road are little more than cow paths, the majority, of course, are graveled, and but very few miles hard-surfaced; you will note also that the average rural carrier works well over 7 hours per day, which is considerably more than the few hours we are usually given credit for; notice also the amount of expense in maintaining our equipment and the sum necessary for equipment; please note also the financial standing of the average rural carrier; in fact, after studying this report you will have a true picture of the average rural carrier in Wisconsin and the problems confronting him.

I am also enclosing herewith accurate expense accounts of a number of carriers for the months of November and December. Of course this amount cannot be taken as a monthly average as at this time of year the expense is slightly over average; however, it is the actual amount spent during these months in order to render service.

Being aware of your fair-mindedness and ever-predominant desire to see that justice prevails, we respectfully solicit your support in the interest of the rural service and the rural carrier, to the end that we may get a square deal, and that the net salary to the rural carriers be at least on the level with that of city carriers and post-office clerks.

Again hoping that this information will be of value and interest to you, and sincerely hoping that Congress will see fit to restore at least a part of the reduction in salary retroactive to January 1934.

Thanking you in advance for your assistance, I am,
Very respectfully yours,

G. F. BARTELT,
President Wisconsin Rural Letter Carriers Association,
Marathon, Wis.

REMARKS.—All figures shown in average column of summary sheet are plus further fractions. Taking the average time during both ideal and difficult conditions, plus office time and time spent in care of equipment, the average rural carrier works a total of 7.37 hours per day.

Salary (average length of route, 32.46 miles)

Annual salary, 33-mile route	$2,070.00
Less 3½ percent deduction for retirement fund ($72.45)	1,997.55
Plus equipment allowance at 4 cents per mile ($403.92)	2,401.47
Less average expense and depreciation on equipment, not figuring interest on investment	655.53
Net salary to carrier	1,745.94
Since the reduction in Government employees' salary the rural carrier has worked for:
Less 3 cents per mile equipment allowance	302.94
Less 15-percent reduction in salary	310.50
Net salary to carrier since reduction	1,132.50
Nov. 1, 1933, 2 cents per mile equipment allowance restored	201.96
Net salary to carrier since Nov. 1	1,334.46

Average rural carrier handles 10,346 pieces of mail per month.

Result of the November questionnaire of a number of rural carriers in Wisconsin

	Number of replies	Grand total	Average
Total number of miles traveled per day	460	14,846.95	32.27
Total amount spent for gas	460	$7,873.94	$17.11
Total amount spent for oil	460	1,289.91	2.81
Total amount spent for tires	460	2,514.37	5.46
Total amount spent for repairs	460	5,559.67	12.08
Amount for other expenses, such as rented warm garage, antifreeze solution, etc	460	2,207.89	4.80
Total amount spent for motor delivery	460	19,445.78	42.27
Amount spent for 170 carriers for horse-drawn equipment:
Total mileage	170	5,162.44	30.37
Amount spent for feed	170	$2,028.02	$11.90
Amount spent for repairs on equipment	170	383.73	2.25
Total amount spent for horse-drawn equipment	170	2,411.75	14.12
Total amount spent, both kinds of equipment	460	21,857.53	47.51

This survey taken among 460 rural carriers from all sections of the State of Wisconsin shows what the average carrier, serving a 32.27-mile route, actually spent during the month of November to render service on said route, or an average of $47.51. This figure does not include depreciation on equipment or new equipment; it represents the actual cash spent for maintenance.

Taking the salary for a 32-mile route, or $2,040 annually, less 3½-percent deduction for retirement fund, and less the 15-percent reduction in Government employees' salary, leaves the carrier a monthly salary of	$138.55
Add equipment allowance, at 3 cents per mile, 25 days	24.00
Total salary to carrier	162.55
Less the $47.51 spent for maintenance and the average monthly depreciation on equipment, as shown by survey of 462 carriers in Wisconsin ($234.45 annually), or $19.53 per month, total expense	67.04
Net salary to carrier	95.51

This report shows the amount spent by 285 carriers during the month of December 1933 in maintaining necessary equipment in order to properly render service on their routes, or an average of $45.66; this figure does not include depreciation on equipment, new equipment, or interest on investment. Reports on file in my office, and their accuracy can be attested to before a notary public.

G. F. BARTELT,
President Wisconsin Rural Letter Carriers Association,
Marathon, Wis.

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LANHAM, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee had had under consideration the bill H.R. 7199, the naval appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 2284. An act relating to contracts and agreements under the Agricultural Adjustment Act.

CONTRACTS UNDER AGRICULTURAL ADJUSTMENT ACT

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table S. 2284, relating to contracts and agreements under the Agricultural Adjustment Act, a similar House bill having been favorably reported from the committee, now on the calendar.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman should make a short statement of what this is.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, some years ago a law was enacted forbidding Members of Congress to enter into any kind of contract with the Government, declaring such contracts void, and fixing a penalty. Under the Agricultural Adjustment Act all those who are producing certain basic commodities are permitted to enter into reduction contracts. Under the terms of this old law the Members of Congress who happen to be interested in farming are unable to go along with the program. This permits them, notwithstanding those provisions, to sign these contracts like any other citizen.

Mr. SNELL. And that is all there is to this?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. It does not cover anybody else?

Mr. JONES. No; the original ban was simply on Members of Congress.

Mr. SNELL. And that applies to this individual subject concerning contracts to reduce acreage?

Mr. JONES. Yes; or to reduction of production.

Mr. SNELL. And it is agreeable to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOPE]?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the provisions of section 3741 of the Revised Statutes (U.S.C., title 41, sec. 22) and sections 114 and 115 of the Criminal Code of the United States (U.S.C., title 18, secs. 204 and 205) shall not apply to any contracts or agreements heretofore or hereafter entered into under the Agricultural Adjustment Act.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A similar House bill was ordered to lie on the table.

C.W.A. MUST CONTINUE "FOR THE DURATION"

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a short editorial from a Philadelphia paper this morning.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial favoring continuation of C.W.A.:

[From the Philadelphia Record of Jan. 21, 1934]

Don't beat a retreat with the battle half won.

Announcement of shortened hours, reduced pay, gradual abandonment of C.W.A. entirely after February 15 is an about face on the most immediately successful offensive of the administration against the depression.

Liberals in Washington must fight for reestablishment of this definite national policy.

C.W.A. must be expanded, not curtailed.

C.W.A. must be continued for the duration of the depression.

When President Roosevelt announced the C.W.A. campaign on November 15, he declared:

"I am very confident that the mere fact of giving real wages to 4,000,000 Americans who today are not getting wages is going to do more to relieve suffering and to lift the morale of the Nation than anything undertaken before."

The President was right. The American Federation of Labor reports that C.W.A. has absorbed 40 percent of the Nation's unemployed. It has provided more new purchasing power than has the entire increase in private business activity.

Are we to call off our forces just when the enemy line is beginning to waver?

When the President talked about "relieving suffering" did he mean until February 15 only? Is there any difference between suffering after February 15 and suffering before February 15?

Isn't it just as important to "lift the morale of the Nation" after February 15 as before?

The President said C.W.A. would transform millions of Americans into "wage-earning, independent workers, no longer dependent on charity."

How long is "no longer"?

Federal Relief Administrator Hopkins declares no new men are to be hired for C.W.A. jobs; that 1,000,000 are to be dropped every 2 weeks after February 15.

But C.W.A. didn't really get started until near the end of December. Only $400,000,000 was allotted to it, all told. Only $216,000,000 has been spent.

It has produced more results, in stimulated consumption and human relief, per dollar invested than any other Federal effort.

Indeed, in view of the tardiness of P.W.A., the logical move for the administration would be to transfer funds from P.W.A. to C.W.A.

The President wants the Nation to spend its way out of depression. C.W.A. and direct relief are the only Federal efforts that have actually succeeded in distributing new purchasing power. P.W.A. has actually spent less than $250,000,000 of its $3,300,000,000, exclusive of its C.W.A. expenditure.

To abandon C.W.A. is to call off our strongest regiment.

Unless the President agrees to have C.W.A. continue for the duration of the depression, the depression will continue far beyond 1935, the year he has set as its end.

OLD-AGE PENSION

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, on last Wednesday evening one of my colleagues from Oklahoma [Mr. MCKEOWN] spoke over a network of 16 stations, originating in the studios of WOL in Washington, extending from New York to San Antonio, Tex. The subject of this most able address is "Federal compensation for old age". The speaker was introduced by Dr. J. E. Pope, president of the National Old Age Pension Association. I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks by including the introductory remarks of Dr. Pope and the address of my colleague.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following:

Dr. POPE. In fighting for a principle it gives one courage to contact a man who is a veteran warrior for our cause. We of Oklahoma are proud of our entire State delegation. Especially are we proud of that stalwart, outstanding Member of the National Congress from Ada. Ladies and gentlemen, it becomes my privilege and high honor to present to you one of God's noblemen, that sturdy and courageous Member of the Congress from the Fourth Oklahoma District, the Honorable TOM D. MCKEOWN.

Mr. MCKEOWN. Thank you, Dr. Pope. Permit me to say that your unselfish devotion to this great cause has endeared you to the hearts of official Washington and to the Nation. Even those who differ with you in opinion are, nevertheless, forced to admire your courage and sincerity.

Ladies and gentlemen, a couple of decades ago if one had suggested old-age security in the United States he would have been immediately branded as the reddest of radicals, but today many of the leading men and women in public life are openly advocating legislation for old-age security. Among the latter is Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt, who recently, before a great audience in the auditorium of the United States Chamber of Commerce, speaking on this subject, said that "it is the right of old people who have worked all of their lives and have failed through no fault of their own to make provision, to be cared for in the last few years of their lives. We did it at first in what I believe a terrible way—the poorhouse."

In the early beginning of our colonial life of America there was a great scarcity of labor, and good wages were paid compared to wages paid for similar work in the old countries. Immigration companies in England advertised high American wages. There was such a scarcity of labor throughout the colonial period that it influenced customs and legislation and was the cause of the establishment of securing workers by contract. During this period every effort was made to control labor by legislative action in order to prevent skilled labor from entering the industry of agriculture due to "the abundance of land and the efforts of companies to plant settlers upon it." In the Colony of Virginia the tendency of skilled labor to become farmers was frowned upon and legislated against, declaring that "it was more to the public welfare and the glory of God to hold them to their trade." It is a long trek from those days when labor was scarce to this period when there is no employment for labor and millions of our people are out of employment. These conditions have been brought about, as all of us realize, by great economical changes due to several causes. The most brutal practice ever inaugurated in industry was inaugurated in the United States—the rule put into effect by several industries that no new employee would be employed that was over the age of 45 years. In other words, 45 years of age was fixed as the dead line over which a worker could not pass in the event he lost his position. It is as a chain that binds him to his doom. It is a gruesome, fatal rule inaugurated by greed and maintained by selfishness. It should be abolished and forever banned from American industry. This rule has added tremendously to the necessity for old-age security.

There is another great group of people in the United States who are now aged and helpless due to the circumstances over which they have no control. After having spent a long life of thrift and saving they placed all their savings in securities that have proven worthless or in banks that have failed. There may be no children upon whom they can depend, and find themselves in extreme want, depending entirely upon the charity of their neighbors. There are some who have been thoughtless and extravagant in the days when they could work and earn their livings, but have lived the lives of honest, respectable citizens. Old-age security should not be limited in its operation to care for the aged, but should also embrace those who are disabled by disease and accident and the unfortunate blind in need.

We have passed humane laws known as "Workmen Compensation Acts", for the benefit of employees who are injured during their employment. Civil damages have always been recoverable by employees for injuries where injuries were due directly to the negligence of the employer, but thousands of employees who were guilty of contributory negligence or the negligence of fellow servants were denied relief.

Many citizens will inquire, Why bring up the question of old-age security at this time when the revenue is at such low ebb and the Treasury so near empty? The answer is the 4 years of severe depression in all lines of business has placed an unbearable burden upon the community where those unfortunate people reside. I would not add to the unfortunate burden of the hard-pressed taxpayer, but it is not fair for the generous-hearted neighborhood friends and citizens to bear this burden all the years; the selfish should be made to contribute their part to this common burden of the American people. There are a number of ways sufficient money can be found to carry this burden without adding additional weight to the hard-pressed taxpayer.

One day in April 1928 I returned to my hotel and found my wife very much upset about an experience she had just passed through. She told me that while on the streets of Washington her attention was attracted by the action of an old couple. The man was looking into a garbage receptacle, and he said to the woman, "I do not find anything." My wife turned immediately and inquired if they had lost something, and then she learned that they were an old, aged couple from a nearby State who had lost their home by foreclosure and having no place to go had come to Washington to find a nephew who lived in the Capital City and, being unable to find him, were without funds or food. He was hunting in the can for something to eat. She administered to their immediate needs and secured a temporary place for them. After she told her story I promised I would do my best to prevent this sort of thing and to lend my energy to the cause of bringing a ray of hope and happiness to the aged and helpless in my country.

As early as May 8, 1928, I introduced in Congress a bill authorizing an appropriation for cooperating with the States granting old-aged and disabled persons pensions, and for other purposes. The committee to which this bill was sent refused to even grant a hearing. That was in the Seventieth Congress, and I followed this again by a bill in the Seventy-first Congress, and it had a similar fate. Again in the first session of the Seventy-second Congress I introduced another bill. In the meantime sentiment for this character of legislation had tremendously grown throughout the United States by the enactment in many States of old-age security legislation.

It has been my contention that it would cost the people of this country very much less to provide and care for the aged, the disabled, and the needy blind through a system where monthly checks could be sent to them than under the present eleemosynary system whereby there is maintained miscellaneous homes for the aged persons. There are at least 10,037 such private homes caring for 68,659 persons at a total cost of $26,306,477; in addition, there are 2,183 poorhouses in the United States housing 85,889 persons at an additional cost of $28,740,535, or an average of $334.64 a person, and with a total investment exceeding $150,000,000.

The old-age security bill that I sponsored did not interfere in any way with the various organized private homes. An old-age security law properly administrated would not encourage the people to abandon thrifty habits, but would assure them contentment and longer lives. It is incomprehensible to me that very many of our people would abandon their efforts to make a livelihood and deliberately place themselves in a helpless financial condition. Old-age security legislation will encourage the self-respect of the citizens because provision is made that whenever one is able to work and can find employment he must earn as much of his living as he can with the assurance that if his earnings fall below $365 per annum that he is guaranteed at least that much to live on.

A system for old-age security should not only provide for the immediate care of the aged, the helpless, and the needy blind, but should make provisions so that oncoming generations can make provision by contribution from their income to their old-age security. In other words, I would provide for contributions from all persons under a fixed age; or, in other words, extend them an opportunity to contribute to the security of their old age and require their employer, where they are wage earners, to contribute something to this fund and the Government administer the distribution of the same.

Whenever the citizen arrives at the age of 65 years and his circumstances are such as not to require old-age assistance he would be permitted to withdraw in a lump sum his savings with the accumulated interest.

If the aged and helpless people are permitted to receive a monthly check they can then go out and bargain for their immediate necessities and this in itself maintains self-respect and eliminates the harrowing worries that shorten their days on this earth.

The need is great and the urge is strong for this legislation and I hope our wishes shall be materialized in the near future.

If any of my Oklahoma friends are listening in I wish to say I am working hard and feeling fine—I'll do my best.

I wish to express my thanks to Dr. J. E. Pope, who at the present time is making a great fight for old-age security legislation and has many friends in Congress who are with him despite any opposition to his efforts. Good night.

RESIGNATION FROM A COMMITTEE

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication:

STARKE, FLA., January 22, 1934.

Hon. HENRY T. RAINEY,
